Self-rule deal nears completion

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and Israel News Service

CAIRO — A deal on implementing the Palestinian self-rule accord could come in less than two weeks, the PLO's chief negotiator said at the conclusion of weekend talks here.

Barring any last-minute hitches, Israel and the PLO could soon wrap up talks on the implementation of the Gaza/Jericho self-rule accord signed last September — possibly by April 18, said Nabil Shaath.

Shaath said there are "about 20 or 30 things left to do, but I don't see any of them as sticky."

The two sides cleared one of the stickiest hurdles last week, when they reached agreement on deployment of about 160 international observers in Hebron.

And the first group of Palestinian police was due to arrive in Gaza Monday morning, as The CJN went to press.

Up to 10 high-ranking Palestinian officers were slated to arrive, mainly to prepare for the arrival of a future larger force, after withdrawal of the Israel Defence Force, scheduled for April 13.

An advance party of between 300 and 500 Palestinian police would then follow, possibly this week.

The agreement, reached last Thursday in Cairo, clears the way for the resumption of talks to implement the Palestinian self-rule accord.

The negotiations on self-rule had been broken off by the PLO after the Feb. 25 murders of at least 30 Palestinians at a mosque in Hebron.

The PLO had called for an international force to guarantee the security of Palestinians living in Hebron as a precondition for resuming negotiations on self-rule in Gaza and Jericho.

Some 160 Norwegians, Danes and Italians will be deployed to serve as observers in Hebron. The move marks the first time since the 1967 Six-Day War that Israel has allowed an international presence in any part of the territories.

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres was scheduled to meet Monday with the ambassadors of Norway, Denmark and Italy to arrange the observation team.

Although the force will be allowed to carry pistols for self-defence, it will have no policing or military duties, according to the terms of the agreement worked out in Cairo.

Ontario Tory leader visits Israel

TORONTO — Mike Harris, leader of Ontario's Progressive Conservative Party, was in Israel this week for what aides describe as a low-key trip.

Later this week, Harris is scheduled to visit Italy and the Vatican, where he is due for an audience with Pope John Paul II.

Last weekend, Harris visited historic religious sites on the Golan Heights and the Sea of Galilee. He spent an evening at Kibbutz Kfar Blum in the north.

On Sunday, he toured the old city of Jerusalem and attended Easter services.

Mike Harris

On Monday, he was scheduled to visit the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial, attend a tree planting at the Jerusalem Peace Forest and have a luncheon meeting with officials of Israel's foreign ministry, including Eitan Bentsur, deputy director-general responsible for North America.

Later Monday, he was slated to meet two MKs, Dan Tihon of Likud and Emmanuel Zissman of Labor.

Harris was due to meet with two Palestinian representatives, Sa'eb Mohammad Erkat, who headed the Palestinian delegation to the last round of Arab-Israeli talks in Washington, and Ziad Abu Zayyad, a negotiator at those talks.

Later Tuesday, he was to have lunch with Canada's ambassador to Israel, Norman Spector.

Later this week, Harris's schedule was to take him to the Italian province of Abruzzi.

In Rome on Thursday, he was scheduled to meet with a group of Canadian Holocaust survivors, who are there to attend a concert in honor of Yom Hashoah.

The Pope is scheduled to attend the concert and Harris was slated to meet with him and other Vatican dignitaries.

Harris's press secretary, Peter Varley, told The CJN the trip was "mainly a private visit."

Travel Information Report

OTTAWA — A Travel Information Report (TIR) strongly recommending that Canadians put off travel to the territories and eastern Jerusalem is still in effect, the Department of Foreign Affairs said on Monday.

A TIR does not carry the same weight as a Travel Advisory, which warns of danger and violence against foreigners and tells prospective travellers to stay away.

A report in the March 17 issue of The CJN erroneously referred to a "travel advisory," rather than a Travel Information Report.

The latest TIR says: "In the face of the recent violence in Hebron, we strongly recommend that Canadians defer travel for the time being to Israeli-occupied areas in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, including east Jerusalem.

"Canadians planning travel within Israel outside major urban centres should consult with the Canadian Embassy [in Tel Aviv] on arrival.

"Canadians should exercise caution, be aware of their surroundings and avoid crowds and demonstrations when travelling in the region," the report states.

It adds that Canadians contemplating travel to the area should first check with Foreign Affairs or the nearest Canadian mission.

"This information is based on current conditions and is meant to assist Canadians in deciding whether to travel. In any event, the final decision is their own," the report says.

AND YOU SHALL LIVE

Behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel. And you shall know that I am the Lord. . . Ezekiel 37.

A time to weep — a time to rejoice

Community to recall sacrifices at Yom Hazikaron assembly

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israeli soldiers who fell in the line of duty will be remembered at a Yom Hazikaron assembly to be held on April 12 at 7:30 p.m. at Adath Israel Congregation, 37 Southbourne Ave., Downsview. The program is expected to run 45 minutes to an hour.

This year a larger portion of the program will be in English to accommodate non-Hebrew speaking audience members. Speakers will include Rabbi Irwin Witty, executive director, Board of Jewish Education, and Israeli Consul General Dror Zeigerman. Cantor Efraim Sapir of Beth Tikvah Congregation will chant K'el Malei Rachamim.

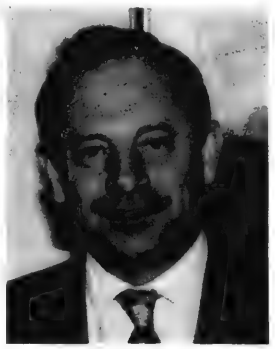
Members of the Toronto Israeli youth movement Tsabar, which is affiliated with the Scouts movement in Israel, and the Ne'Imot choir will also participate in the program. A relative of a fallen soldier will light a memorial candle, and the Order of the Day from Israeli Chief of Staff General Ehud Barak will be read. Hebrew and English songs and readings will comprise an integral part of the program.

Yom Hazikaron immediately precedes Yom Ha'atzmaut (Israel's Independence Day), which falls on April 14 this year. In Israel the day is marked by memorial ceremonies, and flags are flown at half-mast.

The juxtaposition of the two days, the latter being a day of celebration, is symbolic, notes Haim Waxman, Israeli vice-consul. "There can't be that joy [of Yom Ha'Atzmaut] without remembering those [whose sacrifices made the state of Israel possible]," Waxman told The CJN.

Fallen soldiers impel us to continue fight for security and peace

By DROR ZEIGERMAN



Dror Zeigerman

From the chimneys of the concentration camps; from the ashes of Jewish history; from the millions of Jews who perished in countries not their own arose the motivating force that propelled Israeli fighters to create an independent nation for our people. From their graves, the fallen Israeli soldiers impel us to continue the fight for the security and safety of the State of Israel and for peace.

The first generation of settlers knew that in order to survive, the people of Israel must be prepared with helmet and cannon, for without, no tree could be planted and no house could be built. This is the fate of our generation, this is the choice of our existence: to be prepared, armed, strong and determined.

Our struggle for independence continues today. As a result of Arab terror, we sacrifice our lives. But at the same time we fight for peace, knowing at all times that those who have fallen before have shown us how to fight terror as if there were no peace, and continue the peace talks as if there were no terror.

Today, on Yom Hazikaron, the Day of Remembrance, we bow our heads to the memory of all the fallen soldiers who died fighting for the Zionist dream — the Underground, Nili, Haganah, Etzel, Lehi — in the War of Independence, the Sinai Campaign, the Six Day War, the War of Attrition, the Yom Kippur War, Operation Peace for Galilee; and for the victims of terror — children, women and men who were murdered. In total, 18,000 people were taken from us in the struggle for our existence. Each has a name, a family and a history. All died doing their duty. All had personal stories to tell. And all of them together are the strength of our continuity.

This year Yom Hazikaron falls on April 13, the second day of Iyar 5754. Here in Toronto, the Jewish and Israeli communities together salute the victims of Israel's wars and convey their condolences to the bereaved families and the people of Israel.

Zichronam livrachah. May their memory be for a blessing.

Yom Hashoah commemorates deportation of Hungarian Jews

TORONTO — On Sunday, April 10, the Holocaust remembrance committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto will host its annual program commemorating Yom Hashoah (Holocaust Day of Remembrance) and the 50th anniversary of the deportation of the Hungarian Jews and the start of the liberation.

The event begins with a rally at Earl Bales Park (Bathurst Street and Sheppard) at 2:00 p.m. at the Yad Vashem Monument. At the rally, survivor George Salamon, will speak on the deportation of the Hungarian Jews.

The rally will be followed by a march to Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation (55 Yeomans Road, North York) for a cultural program and memorial service which will commence at 2:30 p.m.

The keynote speaker at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation will be Elsa Chandler, trustee and immediate past chairperson of the North York Board of Education. Chandler is one of the few child survivors of the Holocaust from Plaszow, located near Krakow, Poland, the labor-turned-concentration camp where Oskar Schindler found the labor for his factory. Other dignitaries scheduled to speak include Bernard Ghert, president of the Federation and Dror Zeigerman, Israel's consul general.

The congregation's children's choir, under the direction of Barbara Shilling and the adult choir, under the direction of Cantor Yehuda Rottner, accompanied by Brahm, Goldhamer, will perform at the ceremony.

Yom Hashoah, which is commemorated around the world, serves as a memorial and vigil for the six million Jewish victims who perished in the Holocaust. The event commemorates the Resistance Fighters, the Allied Armed Forces and the Righteous Among the Nations.

Deschenes favors deportation, denaturalization for war crimes

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canada's "made in Canada" solution to pursuing suspected Nazi war criminals in Canada has shown little tangible success in terms of prosecutions, says Justice Jules Deschenes, who presided over the Deschenes Commission of inquiry on the issue.

But the commission is showing better results by using denaturalization and deportation provisions that were included in its recommendations, he noted at the recent fifth Rene Cassin Lectureship in Human Rights at McGill University.

The annual lecture, established by the Alliance Israelite Universelle, took place before a full house at the law faculty's Moot Court.

It was co-sponsored by the faculty and by InterAmicus, a human rights advocacy centre founded by law professor and human rights activist Irwin Cotler.

Deschenes, presenting his talk in English and French, noted that of the 900 names his commission first heard about as it was conducting its work, only 30 cases ended up being isolated as "serious."

The five prosecutions launched since the commission issued its report in December 1986 have all been failures, except for Jacob Luitjens, a Nazi war criminal living in Canada who was ultimately deported to the Netherlands.

The prosecutorial track record in other countries like England and Australia, which conducted their own inquiries around the same time as Deschenes, has not fared any better, he said.

"Will there be any more [Canadian] prosecutions? God only knows," he said.

Judge Jules Deschenes

On the international front, however, Deschenes was more optimistic.

For the first time, he said, a process is in place to establish a permanent international tribunal to prosecute war criminals.

The effort has been organized by the United Nation's (UN) International Law Commission and is being strongly supported by Canada.

Such a body, Deschenes said, would "strengthen the principle of universal jurisdiction over individuals who have committed international criminal acts."

The tribunal could also be a deterrent against future war crimes, he said.

Deschenes said efforts towards building the permanent tribunal have been bolstered by the establishment by the UN Security Council of another in The Hague dealing with war crimes perpetrated in the former Yugoslavia.

The UN's General Assembly named Deschenes as one of the tribunal's 11 members.

The court at the Hague took only nine months to be created — "pretty fast indeed," Deschenes remarked — and recently adopted rules of procedure and evidence that went into effect just days before he spoke.

But the speed in creating the body meant striking a delicate balance between "expediency and justice," he said.

The permanent international war crimes tribunal — an idea laid to rest in 1948 after the Nuremberg prosecutions of Nazi war crimninals — will have 18 judges and will wield jurisdiction over a wide variety of acts determined by international treaty.

Deschenes predicted that when the UN commission spearheading this effort drafts its next report for the General Assembly, "it will draw wide international support."

Even to this day, Deschenes noted, crimes against humanity continue to be carried out "with impunity" in countries ranging from Haiti to Vietnam.

Nothing changes, he said, until there is "international solidarity."

And that solidarity was apparently lacking in 1948, when a British commission canvassed other countries in the Commonwealth over its planned announcement that no new war crimes trials would be launched after August of that year.

Canada, Deschenes said, responded with a "no comment."

Auschwitz service gets a poor turnout

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Only two members of the 30-member International Auschwitz Council attended a memorial service recently held at Auschwitz for 3,791 Czech Jews murdered in the gas chambers of the infamous camp, states a report received here from Sigmund Sobolewski, the Canadian delegate to the Council.

The service marked the 50th anniversary of the first day of the mass murders at the Terezin Family Camp of Birkenau on March 8, 1944. Terezin was the location of the so-called showplace Hitler set up to make the world believe the Jews were being well cared for.

Only Sobolewski and Dr. Jonathan Webber of Oxford University, England, joined 500 Czech citizens from Olomouc, Morawska-Ostrawa and Tesin who arrived in 10 buses for the memorial. Rabbi Karol Sidon of the Prague Synagogue and Thomas Kraus, leader of the Federation of Czech Jewish communities, attended.

"Our conference ended at 1 p.m. and the service was at 2.30 p.m.," Sobolewski wrote. "Webber pleaded with the Council to show solidarity with these Czech Jewish survivors. It is another telling sign of the attitude of the Council that not one of them arrived besides Dr. Webber and myself."

The Council makes recommendations to the Polish government about the operation of the Auschwitz Museum and signs and plaques which are erected for victims.

Sobolewski also reported that the Council chair refused to accept a motion of protest from him with respect to a projected monument in the former Carmelite Convent for Christian victims of Auschwitz. He said the Auschwitz administration has not yet given permission to the March of the Living to erect a plaque on the grounds to honor the four Jewish women hanged publicly Jan. 6, 1945.

Network students meet with MPs

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Students from Network Canada, the Canadian arm of World Union of Jewish Students (WUJS), met with 32 members of Parliament in Ottawa recently, to discuss the plight of Syrian Jews on Network's annual Lobby Day.

The meetings followed threats of a pogrom against Syria's remaining 1,050 Jews early last month. The pogrom, threatened by a group called the Syrian Muslim Party of Justice, did not take place.

The group had sent letters to Jewish homes and businesses in Syria, stating that Jewish blood would be spilled on March 13 (the end of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan) to avenge the Hebron mosque massacre.

Students, who met the MPs individually or in pairs, asked the politicians to continue pressuring Syria to grant exit visas to all Jews wishing to leave the country and protection for those wishing to stay.

The MPs who met with the students came from across the country and represented a wide range of parties, from Hedy Fry (Liberal, Vancouver-Centre) to Gaston Peloquin (Bloc Quebecois, Brome-Missisquoi).

Among the other MPs were Mac Harb (Lib., Ottawa Centre), Reform party leader Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest), Jim Peterson (Lib., Willowdale), Joseph Volpe (Lib., Eglinton-Lawrence), Simon de Jong (NDP, Regina-Qu'Appelle), David Berger (Lib., Saint-Henri-Westmount) and David Kilgour (Lib., Edmonton Southeast).

Network "was welcomed with open arms," York University student and Network chair Andrea Silverstone told The CJN. Silverstone, along with lobby day co-ordinator Sara Bergson, spent about half an hour with Preston Manning, who represents Silverstone's hometown riding in Calgary. Manning was "very accommodating," Silverstone said.

Buoyed by the positive feedback, Network director Howard Katz said that the student lobby effort "builds confidence in our parliamentary system."

Rabbi Abraham Price dies at 94

World renowned Torah scholar

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Rabbi Abraham A. Price, a world-renowned Torah scholar and a fixture in Toronto's Orthodox community, died last week. He was 94.

Rabbi Moshe Stern, president of the Vaad Harabonim of Greater Toronto, said he was "a great scholar. With his passing ends the generation of pre-war scholarship decimated by the Holocaust."

Rabbi Stern described him as "an interpretive genius in his logical analyses of Talmud. He took obscure, ancient scholarly writings, interpreted them and brought them to life."

Rabbi Price was born in Stopnitz, in what is now Poland. Considered a child prodigy, he studied with world- famous scholars Rabbi Abraham Borenstein (the Avnei Neizer) in Sochatov and with Rabbi Sillman, the noted rabbi of Chmielnick, who gave him smicha (rabbinic ordination).

In 1923, he went to Berlin, where he became a successful banker. When Hitler came to power, Rabbi Price went to Paris, using journalist papers that he obtained through his close friendship with the Ger chassidic dynasty.

He escaped to the United States in 1939, and shortly thereafter Chevra Shas in Toronto offered him the position of rosh yeshivah of what later became Yeshiva Torah Chaim, a post he held until his death.

When he assumed the pulpit of Chevra Shas, he also became involved in community affairs, particularly kashruth and the eruv (a boundary which allows Jews to carry on Shabbat), about which he was considered a world expert.

In the 1950s, he extended the eruv, originally established by Rabbi Yehuda Leib Graubart in the 1920s, from Bloor Street to Highway 401. In the early 1980s, it was extended further to north of Highway 7.

One of Rabbi Price's most notable achievements was his rescue of young Jewish men, German refugees, who had been mistakenly interned as enemy aliens.

Rabbi Erwin Schild, rabbi emeritus of Adath Israel Congregation, a student of Rabbi Price's, was one of those internees.

"As soon as the refugees' status was properly recognized, in the fall of 1941, he went to see [F.C.] Blair [the anti-Semitic deputy minister of immigration who coined the now-famous phrase 'none is too many']. He convinced him that it would be of benefit to Canada to let us go."

'An interpretive genius in his logical analyses of Talmud'

Some of the former internees, including Rabbi Schild and the late Rabbi Albert Pappenheim, joined his yeshivah. Others, according to Rabbi Schild, who Rabbi Price realized were not suited for the rabbinate, he launched in other academic fields.

Rabbi Price was, Rabbi Schild said, "a scholar beyond compare; the top talmudic scholar of our day, known for his erudition and sharpness."

Some of his other rabbinic students included the late Rabbis Gedalia Felder and Phyvle Rosenzweig, and Rabbis Avraham Kelman and Bernard Rosenzweig.

Although Rabbi Price had withdrawn from public life for the last while, he was widely consulted by rabbinic scholars. Those who were in contact with him described him as having "a gruff exterior," and "not suffering fools gladly."

He wrote extensively, on Halachah, piety, Chumash and mitzvot.

Rabbi Price is survived by his wife, Sarah, daughter Lola Zuchowski, brother Lazar, three grandchildren and three great-grandchildren.

Author probes Canada's white supremacist groups

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Terry Long was born on a farm in central Alberta and raised, by all accounts, in typical fashion for the prairies. Though his parents were involved in mainstream Alberta politics, Long's interests led him to associate with extremist organizations that promoted racism and anti-Semitism.

Long would eventually become leader of the Canadian branch of the Aryan Nations.

Wolfgang Droege was born in Bavaria, the son of a devotee of Adolf Hitler. His father regaled him with stories of his wartime efforts on behalf of the Luftwaffe while his grandfather described his friendship with arch Nazi propagandist Julius Streicher.

Droege later became one of the most recognizable spokesmen for the radical right in Canada.

As a teenager living just outside Toronto, George Burdi became attracted to the writings of Friedrich Nietzsche, particularly to the writer's aversion to Jews.

Burdi would eventually become one of the most strident spokesmen for the Church of the Creator, one of the most virulent racist groups in Canada.

Bill Harcus was born in a small town just outside Winnipeg. At an early age, he dabbled in satanism but later he left devil-worship and adopted Christian Identity, which believes that Anglo-Saxons are the true Israelites while Jews are the descendants of Satan.

Harcus would become one of Winnipeg's major distributors of Ku Klux Klan literature, despite his parents' attempts to convince him of the errors of his ways.

If there is one element shared by this rogues' gallery, any common background, education or family upbringing, it's difficult to see. Whether born abroad or in Canada, raised by tolerant, liberal parents or by admirers of Hitler, they have made extremist politics the focal point of their lives.

In a sweeping illustration of Canada's neo-Nazi movement, author and former Ottawa Citizen reporter Warren Kinsella has brought together their stories to describe the far-right movement in Canada. His new book, Web of Hate; The Far Right Network in Canada, published by Harper Collins ($26.95), describes in minute detail the ideological and organizational links among white supremacist groups across the country.

Based on extensive reading on the subject and interviews with key figures and their families, Kinsella has compiled an important reference work for anyone interested in the subject. While he does not break much new ground in his book (he relies to a great extent on reports carried by the daily press and he cites The CJN as well), he expands on these reports and adds personal interviews.

The growth of the Ku Klux Klan and the Aryan Nations in Western Canada, the story of former Moncton teacher Malcolm Ross, the evolution of white supremacist organizations in Toronto and Ottawa all come under scrutiny by Kinsella, who is also author of Unholy Alliances, a book that chronicles the links between Libya and Canadian right wing extremists.

In addition, Kinsella profiles key leaders of the various groups in an attempt to determine what makes them tick. While this largely unexplored aspect of white supremacists could well be the subject of a more in-depth analysis, his reporting does add some new insight into their lives.

His description of the racist groups' activities and recruiting makes for fascinating reading, but perhaps the most disturbing aspect of the book is Kinsella's description of Cpl. Matt McKay of the Canadian Airborne Regiment and the government response to revelations of his activities — which included being photographed giving the Nazi salute in front of a swastika banner in the regiment's barracks.

Several members of the same unit who served as peacekeepers in Somalia are undergoing courts-martial in connection with the death of a Somali teenager in that African country. McKay is not one of them.

Kinsella, formerly a special assistant to Jean Chretien before Chretien became prime minister and currently an aide to David Dingwall, the minister responsible for the Post Office, is scathing in his indictment of the attitude of the previous Conservative government to racists in the military.

He asks how such individuals could be allowed to remain in the armed forces and even be assigned to duties in Somalia. McKay, he points out, is not the only racist serving in the military.

That story, coupled with his descriptions of the growing attempts by racists to recruit soldiers, school children, the unemployed and others marginalized by chronic unemployment, is perhaps the most disturbing aspect of the story Kinsella tells so well.

Wolfgang Droege

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

SHERIFF

Accountant Todd Sheriff of Mintz & Partners Ltd. quotes his father as having anglicized his surname from Sherovsky. That rules out any relationship with the famous Sheriff of Nottingham.

Sheirov may be traced to one of two sources. It derives probably from sher — a pair of scissors, which was a tool of the tailoring trade, like Nadel (needle), Fingerhut (thimble) and Shereisen (iron).

The appendages "ov" and "ski" are suffixes denoting origin.

An alternate but less probable interpretation attributes the name to the Hebrew word shayur meaning lesson, which could define a teacher (Lehrer).

Self-rule deal said to be near completion

The observers will be in place for an initial three-month period, a mandate that is renewable for additional three-month periods.

Denmark will reportedly send police rather than soldiers — a move that may be followed by the other participants.

Under the terms of the agreement, the observer force will wear distinctive uniforms and will travel in marked vehicles.

In a major concession, the PLO backed off from its original demand for a Palestinian police force to patrol the streets of Hebron, which has been the site of ongoing violence since the Feb. 25 killings.

The accelerated measures were adopted in an effort to make up for time lost when the talks were suspended.

April 13 was the deadline set last September for Israeli troops to complete their pull-out from Gaza and Jericho.

According to Israel Radio, Israel Defence Force officials said Thursday that they can complete withdrawal from Gaza within 72 hours after the order is given.

In other weekend developments:

• Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin assured settlers Sunday night that the government has no intention of expelling Jews from Hebron or any part of the territories during the interim period of Palestinian self-rule.

"There will be no changes until the end of the final status negotiations, if at all," the Council for Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza said in a statement that quoted Rabin.

"According to the Oslo agreement, there will be no uprooting of settlements during the interim period," confirmed Rabin's spokesman, Oded Ben-Ami.

• The civil administration in the territories came in for criticism following the reinstatement Sunday of the former mayor of Hebron, Mustafa Natshe.

Natshe was reinstated at the request of PLO leader Yasser Arafat. He was elected mayor of Hebron in 1976 but removed from office by Israel in 1983 for supporting terrorist organizations and calling for incitement.

Alexander Gross, father of yeshivah student Ahron Gross, who was murdered in Hebron in 1983, said he will petition the High Court of Justice against Natshe's re-appointment.

• The mayor of Kiryat Arba, Zvi Katzover, told the government commission investigating the Hebron massacre that there could be more killings if Jews are not made to feel safe.

• Israeli security officials began shutting down jails and other buildings in Gaza and Jericho. In Gaza City, police pulled out of three buildings used by police and shut down the city's jail. The last 32 Palestinian prisoners were placed on buses and moved to an undisclosed location.

Israeli police arrest Kach leader Marzel

CJN wire services

JERUSALEM — After three weeks on the run, Kach leader Baruch Marzel was arrested by Israeli police while he was hiding out in the home of a settler suspected of killing a Palestinian in cold blood last year.

Police said Marzel was asleep when they came to arrest him at 6 a.m. last Sunday. He offered no resistance.

Marzel, 35, was one of about a dozen Kach and Kahane Chai activists ordered detained following the massacre in Hebron in which Kach member Dr. Baruch Goldstein killed 30 Arab worshippers at a mosque in the Cave of Machpela (Cave of the Patriarchs).

Following the shooting, the Israeli government outlawed the Kach movement as a terrorist organization.

Terrorist organization

Marzel was captured at the home of Yoram Skolnik, a friend who is awaiting trial in the shooting death of a Palestinian. Police allege that Skolnik shot a bound Arab at close range in March 1993. The shooting took place in the Jewish settlement of Susiya, eight miles south of Hebron. The victim's hands and feet were bound and he was stripped naked, police allege.

While in hiding, Marzel taunted police by sending a photograph to newspapers showing him celebrating the Passover holiday with his family. He told reporters that he had changed hide-outs close to 40 times to avoid police.

Last week, journalists saw him at a demonstration in Kiryat Arba, a Jewish town adjacent to Hebron, where he lived with his wife and six children.

Marzel will be held without trial for three months under special military regulations. Kach members are under arrest in a high-security wing at the Sharon Prison to prevent any possibility of escape.

CORNERING CANCER

The pace of cancer research has entered a phase of exponential acceleration. Scientists are engaged in thousands of new projects to detect, diagnose, treat and prevent malignancies. The Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, Israel, is part of the thrust. In years past, Weizmann scientists demonstrated that cancer development is a multi-step process, and identified the oncogene associated with myeloid leukemia. Today, their research includes magnetic resonance spectroscopy procedures to detect breast cancer... photodynamic techniques for pinpointing chemotherapy... development of a lung cancer vaccine effective in mice... and projects bearing on prostate cancer, ovarian cancer and melanoma. They have also joined the universal pursuit of non-invasive genetic therapies requiring successful identification of genes that induce malignancies and genes (notably p53) that suppress them. All over the world, interdisciplinary cancer research with sophisticated equipment needs the encouragement of public and private resources responsive to burgeoning opportunities.

Re: 1994 Annual Meeting

The 1994 Annual Meeting of the Jewish National Fund of Canada will be held in Montreal, Quebec, at the Jewish National Fund of Canada Boardroom, 1980 Sherbrooke Street West, Suite 500, Montreal, Quebec on Sunday May 8th, 1994 at 12:00 noon.

The Learning Family

Ulpan Akiva's Innovative program which encourages the shared family experience.

Families from all over the world, as well as from Israel, congregate at Ulpan Akiva's campus, beside the beach in southern Netanya, for a unique family experience combining learning with leisure, enjoying full-board accommodation. Parents and their teenage (over 12 years) children take a part in Hebrew or Arabic courses while in the summer, the younger kids join a day camp nearby (at Moshav Udim).

The families are joining a learning community of Israelis, tourists, temporary residents and new immigrants — Jews and non-Jews — students of all ages, civil servants, teachers on sabbatical and others.

The courses last 24 days or 8 weeks, with 5 hours of classes a day. Then there are loads of social and cultural activities during the remaining hours of the day and evening, plus walks, tours and a study Shabbat.

Resist leaving Hebron, Jews urged

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Likud MK and former defence minister Ariel Sharon last week called for massive non-violent resistance to any attempt by the government to remove the Jewish community of Hebron.

At the same time, Likud issued an official statement warning that the PLO has "renewed" the intifada and calling on the government to review its commitment to the self-rule accord.

Sharon said he advocates passive resistance to the evacuation of Hebron, which he believes the government is now planning.

He called upon "tens of thousands" to join in such resistance, which he characterized as "the single, last, and only measure which we can take to combat the sheer madness of this government's capitulation to the PLO, even if the government persists in telling us that the expulsion of the Jews from the second holiest city in Judaism is its own initiative."

Should the government begin to remove the Jews from Hebron, Sharon expects that "many thousands of Israelis will flock to the city to foil the scheme to make Hebron 'Judenrein.'

"But I stress that they must come unarmed, with empty hands, so that no provocation could possibly occur. Every effort must be made to prevent the evacuation of Jews, but I emphasize that this must be totally non-violent and that no Israeli should lift a hand against an IDF soldier.

Ariel Sharon

"Much determination, devotion and perseverance will be required, and should, heaven forbid, any site be cleared of its inhabitants, the protesters should again and again return to it, but strictly without the use of force. This is the last weapon at our disposal," Sharon said.

The hawkish MK said he would be there himself to personally take part in the protest, and he believes many other public figures would join as well.

The Likud officially accused Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin of "deliberately turning a blind eye to the fact that the PLO has renewed the intifada. The fact that the prime minister prefers to ignore this reality attests to his intention to fulfill the Oslo Accords unilaterally and at any cost, regardless of what the other side does.

"Rabin has thus given up on all the demands which Israel has made of the PLO. This is yet one more episode in Rabin's ongoing policy of obsequiousness before [Yasser] Arafat."

The Likud went on to say that "Rabin can still, even at this late stage, reverse the situation, by re-assessing the Oslo Accords, particularly in view of the total collapse of these accords and the relaunching of the intifada."

Outcome of Italy's election concerns Jews

Voters shift towards the right

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — The landslide victory in Italy's parliamentary elections last week by a right-wing alliance led by billionaire media tycoon Silvio Berlusconi has opened the door to a government including neo-fascists and has left many Italian Jews deeply concerned.

"The trend is evident: It is the consequence of a period of great uncertainty resulting from the recession and corruption scandals," said Tullia Zevi, president of the Union of Italian Jewish Communities.

She said she hoped that whoever became prime minister would remain true to Italy's postwar history, born "out of the ashes of fascism" and with a constitution that protects minorities and guarantees rights.

Many Jews, like many non-Jewish Italians, had a tough choice in the elections.

While some rightist candidates and Berlusconi's business-oriented platform appealed to some Jewish voters, many were reluctant to vote for any alliance that included the neo-fascists.

On the other hand, while many Jews were sympathetic to the left, some were reluctant to vote for an alliance that included hard-line Communists, who have long favored anti-Israel causes.

"I could never have voted for the right, and I supported the progressive (leftist) alliance in general," said one Rome Jew, a university professor. "But I could not vote for the Stalinists."

Berlusconi's so-called Freedom Alliance links his 2-month-old Forza Italia (Go, Italy) party with the neo-fascist National Alliance and the separatist Northern League.

The three parties now control a majority of 366 seats in the 630-member Chamber of Deputies and a qualified majority of 155 in the Senate. By contrast, former Communist Achille Orcchetto's left-wing Progressive group won 213 seats in the lower house.

The right-wing alliance's victory opens the possibility of a government that for the first time would include the neo-fascists.

"However the seats are distributed, one thing is clear," neo-fascist leader Gianfranco Fini told a victory rally. "There is no way a non-left government can be formed without our 13 percent."

Many here are worried about this possibility along with the overall success of the neo-fascists, who, with more than 13 percent of the vote, now constitute the third largest party in the country.

The neo-fascists are heirs to wartime fascist dictator Benito Mussolini and long languished at the extremes of the Italian political spectrum.

The polished, 42-year-old Fini has spent considerable effort attempting to rid the party of its old jackboot image. It even changed its name to the National Alliance from the Italian Social Movement after electoral successes in local elections last fall.

Fini also has pushed the image of his party as "clean," arguing that since it was ostracized by the government for so long, it was not involved in the corruption scandals that have virtually destroyed the traditional ruling parties and kicked hundreds of top politicians out of their jobs.

Nonetheless, militant right-wing youths were among the 2,000 people at Fini's victory rally in Rome's Piazza del Popolo, giving the straight-armed fascist salute and shouting "Duce, Duce." Il Duce, or the leader, was the title used to hail Mussolini.

Mussolini's granddaughter, Alessandra, trounced her opposition to win a parliament seat in Naples. On the eve of the election, she had condemned the recent firebombing of a synagogue in Lubeck, Germany, saying, "However these elections go, in Italy's Second Republic there won't be room for intolerance or racism."

The elections were held over two days, Sunday and Monday, in order to allow observant Jews, barred from voting on Passover, to go to the polls after sundown last Monday night.

Neo-fascists in coalition

Many non-Jewish politicians and celebrities chose to vote after sundown Monday to show solidarity with the Jewish community.

But Berlusconi angered many Jews by voting not just after sundown but — with much fanfare — at a polling place in Rome's old Jewish ghetto, where he was heckled and accused of blatant manipulation.

Zevi and other Jewish leaders told reporters that Berlusconi's move was "demagogic."

"It wasn't welcomed with an enthusiastic embrace because one can see that the right is not really inscribed in the chromosomes of our people," Zevi was quoted as saying.

She compared the move to Fini's having gone last fall to lay flowers at the Fosse Ardeatine monument outside Rome to more than 300 Romans, including about 70 Jews, executed by the Nazis in retaliation for a partisan attack during World War II.

In other races, television reporter Fabrizio del Noce ran successfully on the Berlusconi ticket in a Rome district with a strong Jewish community. He had courted the Jewish vote during his campaign based on his own well-known sympathy and support for Israel.

"For me, a candidate's attitude toward Israel and the Jews is an important reason to vote for him," said David Funaro, a Jew who actively worked for del Noce's election.

Jews are blamed for firebombing at German shul

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LUBECK — The leader of Germany's ultra-right Republican Party, Franz Schonhuber, has laid blame for last month's firebombing of a synagogue here squarely on the head of the German Jewish community, Ignatz Bubis.

Schonhuber, a former member of the SS, described Bubis, a Holocaust survivor, as one of the country's "worst agitators," adding that the Jewish leader was "responsible for anti-Semitism in Germany."

A spokesman for the Bavarian Ministry of the Interior said that the state prosecutor is considering court action against Schonhuber for insulting Bubis. But, the spokesman added, if Bubis does not bring charges against Schonhuber "our hands are tied."

Ignatz Bubis

Bubis later issued a statement saying he will not bring charges, saying that doing so would only provide Schonhuber with a platform for launching more rhetoric.

The president of the German Parliament, Christian Democrat Rita Sussmuth, said in a statement that Schonhuber, "who makes the Jewish victims into perpetrators, deserves to be outlawed by the whole society."

The ugly statements only served to heighten raw emotions in the wake of the first firebombing of a German synagogue since World War II.

On March 25, two Molotov cocktails were hurled at the synagogue in this northern port town.

The firebombs destroyed a meeting room on the first floor of the synagogue and endangered the lives of several Jewish residents who were sleeping on the second floor.

Local police focused their investigation on local members of neo-Nazi organizations.

The synagogue was destroyed once before, on Kristallnacht, Nov. 9, 1938, when the Nazis conducted a nationwide pogrom against German Jewry.

The day after the bombing, demonstrators reportedly numbering more than 4,000 marched through the streets of Lubeck to protest the incident.

City authorities called for the observation of five minutes of silence to reflect on the implications of the attack.

Some local commentators said the attack was timed to coincide with the start of Passover. But the state district attorney said an anti-Israel motive could not be ruled out, according to a German radio report.

The state government of Schleswig Holstein, where Lubeck is located, offered a $29,000 reward to anyone providing information that would lead to the arrests of those responsible. The Federal Attorney's Office in Karlsruhe has taken over the investigation.

Six families lived in the synagogue, including the synagogue's cantor. Among them was a local Holocaust survivor who had returned to live in the town.

No one was hurt, as the residents managed to evacuate the synagogue in time. Police said one of the Molotov cocktails did not explode.

The Central Council of Jews in Germany said in a statement that the attack "belongs to a series of shameful assaults on foreigners and those believed to be foreigners that has already caused many deaths."

The council, headed by Bubis, called for tougher criminal penalties for the perpetrators of hate crimes.

Security tight around Bonn Israeli Embassy

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BONN — Acting on warnings of possible terrorist activity, German police last week tightened security around the Israeli Embassy in the German capital.

A police spokeswoman said that streets surrounding the Israeli Embassy were sealed off last Tuesday and that security has been tightened around the ambassador's residence. She added that people living near the embassy have to show identity cards before they will be allowed into the area.

The new measures were taken to protect the Israeli diplomats after German intelligence sources warned of possible terrorist acts, the spokeswoman added.

She said the measures will continue during the next few days due to "the specially tense situation" in Israel.

Ilan Mor, a spokesman for the Israeli Embassy, said many policemen were posted at the roadblocks nearby, but that Israeli diplomats were carrying on with their normal activities.

"We did not receive any threats lately," he said.

The News in Brief

Droege Signs Consent

TORONTO — The leader of the neo-Nazi Heritage Front last week agreed not to communicate messages which "expose a person or persons to hatred or contempt" on the grounds of race, color, nationality or ethnic origin. Wolfgang Droege's signature on the consent order ends a 14-month-long battle over a complaint about a racist telephone hotline here.

The consent order was accepted by a panel of the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal, and ended its hearings into the complaint, which was filed on behalf of the Native Canadian Centre.

However, Droege and two other members of the Front still face a contempt of court charge, which is unaffected by last week's agreement. The charge alleges that Droege and the others conspired to circumvent and violate a Federal Court order — which had ordered them to cease playing the messages — by setting up a second telephone hotline.

The Front's lawyer, Harry Doan, said last week's settlement may mean the resumption of the hotline messages.

Not Guilty Plea in Shooting

NEW YORK — Rashad Baz, the Lebanese national charged with second degree murder, attempted murder and various weapons charges in the shooting of four Lubavitch students March 1, pleaded not guilty to the charges last week.

Baz, 28, was ordered held without bail for the murder of Aaron Halberstam, a 16-year-old student, and for wounding Nachum Sossonkin, 18, who remained in "very critical" condition in hospital last week.

The teens were shot while riding in a van as it drove across the Brooklyn Bridge after a visit to a Manhattan hospital to pray on behalf of the Lubavitcher rebbe.

Also pleading not guilty were two Jordanians, Hilal Mohammed, and Bassam Reyati. Both are charged with hindering prosecution and weapons possession, but are free on bail.

Multifaith 'Universal Seder'

JERUSALEM — The seder plate included an olive branch and the Kiddush was followed by a reading from the Koran and the Lord's Prayer in Aramaic as several dozen Jews, Christians, and Muslims gathered at Jerusalem's Beit Shmuel last Monday night for a "Universal Seder."

Led by Rabbi Zalman Schachter-Shalomi, spiritual mentor of the U.S. chavurah movement, the gathering included local Jews and Palestinians, Black Hebrews from Dimona, and a wide array of visitors from as far as Sri Lanka and India.

The event was organized by Ruth Broyde Sharon, a Jewish filmmaker from the United States, and Dolores Gray, an African-American minister who organizes tourism to Israel, and who had arranged a similar gathering last year based around a tour of American Jews and blacks.

This year, when participants backed out following the Hebron massacre, the two women decided to go ahead with the seder.

Beilin Plans Oman Trip

JERUSALEM — Shlomo Gur, a top aide to Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin, flew to Oman last week, leading an advance team planning for Beilin's landmark visit to that Persian Gulf country as head of Israeli delegation to multilateral talks on water on April 17.

Meanwhile, Qatari Foreign Minister Sheikh Hamad Thani confirmed that his country will invite Israel to attend a multilateral arms control session on May 2.

Standoff Ends Peacefully

JERUSALEM — Israeli police ended a stand-off with a group of heavily armed cultists late last month with no loss of life.

In a scene reminiscent of the Branch Davidians who holed up in Waco, Texas last year, about 100 armed followers of Yemenite Rabbi Uzi Meshulam barricaded themselves in the home of their leader in the development town of Yehud.

They vowed to kill or be killed if the government did not conduct an "honest" inquiry into the fate of an undetermined number of Yemenite babies who disappeared during 1949 and the early 1950s.

Doctors who recall that period, when tens of thousands of Yemenites arrived in Israel, say the hospitals were ill-equipped in the development towns to which the immigrants were assigned. Many children died and many were taken into hospitals without being properly registered.

The drama concluded without bloodshed, as two Knesset members promised to establish a commission to look into the issue.

Later, Police Minister Moshe Shahal appointed a commission of inquiry. Its findings are due next week.

Preserving Ukrainian Sites

KIEV — A conference on the preservation of Jewish sites was held here in the wake of a recent accord between Ukraine and the United States that guarantees government protection of all Ukrainian Jewish sites.

The two-day seminar on March 20 and 21 was sponsored by the Jewish Preservation Committee, a group established last year by the Union of Jewish Religious Organizations of Ukraine and the Association of Jewish Organizations and Communities in Ukraine.

The seminar brought together leading researchers and preservationists of Jewish sites to begin an ambitious project of documenting all Jewish cemeteries, synagogues and communal buildings in Ukraine.

Documentation is seen as the first step toward the preservation of many of these sights.

Since Ukraine attained independence in 1991, numerous synagogues which had previously been confiscated were returned to local Jewish communities.

Artist Envisions Peace Symbol

GENEVA — A Swiss "space artist" is planning an ambitious peace symbol: a floating, wooden arch to be placed upon the Dead Sea.

Artist Pierre-Andre Vuitel of Neuchatel envisions a structure with arches rising more than 50 metres to mark the year 2000 as well as the "50th anniversary of Israel and Palestine."

The mobile monument's interior would accommodate up to 2,000 people, and be used for concerts, lectures and other cultural events.

"My work should (restore) the dignity to the peoples of the region. The harmony of the Dead Sea will do the rest," Vuitel said. "It is a project representing life on the Dead Sea."

Occupation under siege: now stumbling to its end?

By YESHAYAHU ANUG

Those who opposed the establishment of the commission that is now investigating how the massacre in the mosque was at all possible and whether it could have been avoided, knew what they were doing. But they were outvoted and as a result, much more than the details of Dr. Baruch Goldstein's crime and the appalling lassitude of security are being uncovered by the commission. The judges may stick to their limited mandate and not aim at establishing "indirect responsibility," that is, exposing the general political climate in which the episode could take place.

Whatever road it chooses, the commission may not manage to clear the air of what, in fact, is clearly emerging from the hearings. For on trial now are obviously not only Goldstein's crime and his weird Kahane philosophy. The wider periphery of many brands of nationalistic-religious extremism, which had grown during the 27 years of occupation and were actually caused by it, and the general indifference to the dangers they present are being mercilessly exposed. It is by now irrelevant to seek consolation in the fact that originally the occupation was meant to be enlightened, or that even now it still compares favorably with other occupations in modern times.

The embarrassing truth is that the myth of the smooth occupation of the territories with their hostile Arab population began to crumble nearly seven years ago when the mistake was made of confronting the intifada only militarily. Nor is it surprising that when the policy changed and the peace process was started, its opponents on both sides saw their last opportunity to sabotage its progress.

Neither Hamas and its sister organizations on the Arab side, nor the Jewish extremist-rightist groups in Israel and in the territories could reconcile themselves to the idea that the whole country cannot be theirs alone and must be partitioned once more in an overdue effort to secure for both peoples a bearable future in neighborly co-existence.

Yeshayahu Anug

While the commission slowly unravels the gloomy details of the massacre and the Arabs in Hebron dream of vengeance, Islamic fanatics there and elsewhere engage in sporadic attacks and are pursued by Israel's security in almost daily combat. At the same time, Jewish zealots in that city and elsewhere believe that the paroxysm of escalating violence is a sure indication of the dawning of messianic times, bound to herald redemption.

In the more down-to-earth Jewish sector, the political right surely condemns the excesses on its fringes, but it is still reluctant to co-operate with the government in an attempt to stem their activities. The official religious establishment too, with few unremarkable exceptions, is tragically missing the unique opportunity to effectively combat the primitive hatred and the related fear of peace. These are propagated in the name of religion by some religious leaders among large sectors of the uneducated public.

Concurrently, in the rest of Israel's sober and worried population, an unexpected catharsis, a keen yearning for radical change is slowly gathering strength. A great deal of soul-searching is going on, even if its outward manifestations are still not clearly articulated. The government, as well as the responsible opposition, are aware of this change in the national mood and although the gap between their official policies is as wide as ever, the writing on the wall is there for all to see.

It says clearly not only that the massacre was a disastrous episode perpetrated by a disturbed individual, but also that there is a breeding ground around Goldstein's memory which too many still revere. The episode must be a turning point. The warning does not say explicitly what will happen if it is filed away unattended. It does not have to.

Whether one likes it or not, the Israeli occupation of most territories seized in 1967 is now coming to its inevitable slow end and the only practical questions are what the Palestinians will be able to make of their emerging self rule and how skillfully the Israeli side will absorb the setback of the illusionist policies for which all the governments since 1967 bear equal responsibility. If either side or both should fail, the future will be bleak for both peoples.

With the writing on the wall in everyone's mind, it was not easy to patch up the injured peace process, but signs are that it is taking off again, after all. To the first terms of reference, self-rule in Gaza and Jericho, Hebron has been added as a third item. In fact, the new arrangements in Hebron will pave the way to finalizing the negotiations on the other two. The opponents of the peace process in Israel are up in arms against the concessions promised by the government to the Palestinians in Hebron and are demanding that the process should be halted.

Once again, no alternative is being offered. But only blind critics of the newly created circumstances will envy the PLO for this extension of its interests. In fact, it will be a very weakened PLO that has won this additional bitter prize as a result of the massacre in Hebron and will have to prove its authority in an environment of profound local distrust. It is by no means certain that it will succeed. Nor can one imagine at this stage how the many factors called upon to jointly guarantee law and order in Hebron — Israeli military, Palestinian police and UN (probably Norwegian) observers — will be able to work together.

An unprecedented sense of urgency to proceed rapidly towards some sort of comprehensive settlement — the Syrian front not excluded — is clearly now in the air. President Yitzhak Rabin's government has barely one year left to prove to the nation — and to the Arabs — that it was serious when it promised to act. Gone is the time lost in bickering over small details and over face-saving manipulations. With or without foreign assistance, important as this may be, the two parties must now join in a race for pacification and make it work. The outside world has recently shown very little capability to act decisively in local conflagrations, and small nations have been free to bleed each other to death. And there are cracks in U.S.-Russian co-operation in the Mideast peace process which could dangerously widen if results are not quickly produced.

The massacre as an accelerator of pacification? Maybe, because in the unfriendly skies darkened by the slaughter, a ray of hope is now attacking the gathering clouds, in a desperate effort to disperse them. How this battle will end, will depend on how determined the protagonists in the peace camps are to openly present the odds to their constituents against the looming alternative. If they falter, the Goldsteins on both sides, who are praying for the storm to destroy the fragile prospects of pacification, will celebrate their deadly triumph.

Soldiers face decisions of conscience

By CARL ALPERT

The Israel Defence Forces have already had some experience with soldiers who found a conflict between orders they received and their own personal principles or beliefs. There have been dozens of cases where men refused to serve in the territories or in Lebanon, claiming conscientious objection. They were prepared to do their military service anywhere else, but not under conditions to which they objected on political grounds. Many of them were sentenced to short terms in prison on charges of insubordination, and some served in repeat cases. Without actually acknowledging acquiescence, the army eventually appeared to discreetly avoid sending these soldiers into contentious areas.

The IDF is quite aware of new difficulties it will face should it become necessary to vacate certain areas. The settlers themselves have already vowed to resist any attempt to get them out. Some among them warn that they are even prepared to fight the Israeli army if necessary.

No long memory is required to recall the scenes over ten years ago when Israel's men in uniform were engaged in the unpleasant and thankless task of evacuating the last hard core settlers who barricaded themselves into the basements and on the rooftops of Yamit. No weapons were used, but there was considerable pushing and shoving and dragging as Israeli soldiers overpowered the last of the die-hards.

It must be kept in mind that this is, in effect, an army of civilians, especially when tens of thousands of reservists are called into active duty. They represent a cross-section of public opinion, and the problems become acute when their legitimate views on vital political issues come into conflict with military discipline which may require them to take unpopular action.

Former Chief Rabbi Shlomo Goren caused a furor not long ago when he went on public record and declared that a soldier who receives an order to evacuate a settlement would be justified, under Jewish law, in refusing to carry out such an order, since it violates the commandment to settle the land. The rabbi, who holds the reserve rank of major-general, was roundly condemned for his words, which were seen as incitement to disobedience.

Some men have already privately indicated they will not be a party to dragging women out by their hair, or evacuating crying babies.

Military authorities are not happy with the situations which could develop, and they are already giving much thought to possible courses of action. An educational program is now being conducted in the armed forces, to explain the government point of view and the blessings to be derived from a peace agreement. The price to be paid, it is being emphasized, is relatively low in return for national security. It is not for the army to reach political decisions in such matters, but to carry out policy as determined by the civilian authorities.

Loud protests were voiced to the effect that the soldiers were being given only one side of the national controversy, and in recent weeks, other points of view have been presented for groups of officers. It is bruited about that even in the top command there are some who are unhappy about the policy they may be called upon to implement. In the early stages of the negotiations, it will be recalled, the armed forces were not a party to the discussions, although they would ultimately be responsible for implementation. At a later stage Prime Minister Rabin did call on the military to take part in the talks.

There will be no easy answers to the problem.

Promises to Israeli Arabs yet to be fulfilled

By KENNETH BANDLER

More than 18 months ago, in a historic statement to the Knesset, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin declared that "for years we erred in our treatment of Israel's Arab citizens." Signalling a sea change in the government's approach toward the Arab minority, Rabin pledged to do everything possible to close the "substantial gaps between the Jewish and Arab communities."

However, contrary to the expectations engendered by those bold statements, the Rabin government has made little progress toward realizing its policy goals regarding the 18 per cent of Israelis who are Arabs. That is the sobering conclusion of a recently released assessment of the government's performance vis-a-vis the Arab minority. The report, prepared by a Jewish-Arab advocacy group called Sikkuy, concludes that both the prime minister and the cabinet "[have] yet to find time for significant involvement in matters relevant to the Arab citizens."

Founded in 1991 with broad support among prominent Israeli Jews and Arabs, Sikkuy (a chance in Hebrew) has been pressing the government to adopt a comprehensive, long-term program that would promote equal opportunity for Israeli Arabs. Sikkuy is the first organization in Israeli history with the standing to advocate for significant improvements in the conditions of Arab citizens.

True, the Rabin government is the first to make the economic and social needs of the country's Arab citizens a priority, and allocations toward that end were more than doubled in the 1993 budget. However, there still has not been a determined effort to replace the traditional ad hoc approach to Israeli Arabs with a long-term plan that systematically identifies gaps to be closed and sets timetables for doing so.

Among the few initiatives the Rabin government has undertaken regarding Israeli Arabs, some 50 per cent of whom live below the poverty line, is the decision to equalize Jewish and Arab incomes over a three-year period, beginning this year. This action will terminate the longstanding practice of giving families of army veterans large child allowances — a practice that has been singularly discriminatory against Arab citizens.

In education, efforts are under way to bring about equality in Education Ministry expenditures for Jewish and Arab schools, as well as to increase the number of classrooms and improve the overall quality of education in Arab communities. While these measures are presently limited to elementary schools, they represent promising steps in a vital sphere of Israeli society, which was sharply criticized in a 1992 state comptroller report citing gross disparities between Jewish and Arab schools.

Another longstanding inequity favoring Jewish communities has been in the distribution of grants from the Ministry of Interior to municipalities. The complaints of Arab mayors were answered in August 1991, when the Shamir government agreed to equalize these allocations within four years. The Rabin government has continued to implement that policy.

In contrast to the progress in these areas, efforts to remedy high unemployment and depressed economic conditions among Israeli Arabs have been negligible. The failure to integrate Israeli Arabs into public institutions remains a major problem. Notwithstanding Rabin's appointment of two Arabs as deputy ministers, virtually no Arabs are employed in any government ministry. Recommendations for ending the absence of Arabs in the civil service were offered by a government commission in 1978, but not implemented. In 1990 the Likud government committed to hire 100 Arabs each year, but there was no follow-up. The Rabin government also has yet to implement its decision to earmark 80 civil service posts and create 80 new posts for qualified Arabs.

Sikkuy cautions that "as long as Arab citizens of Israel are not visibly employed in government offices in Jerusalem and other public institutions, the feeling will persist among them that they are not real partners in the state and the danger of alienation and separatism will prevail." To rectify this critical shortcoming, Sikkuy asserts that each government minister must personally facilitate the hiring of a certain number of qualified Arabs every year. The report also strongly urges that Arabs be employed in positions that serve the general, not just the Arab, population.

Government policies regarding economic development historically have favored establishing industrial development zones and financing new businesses in Jewish communities. To facilitate economic development among Israeli Arabs, the Rabin government is establishing priority regions in which Jewish and Arab communities would enjoy the same financial benefits. However, steps have not been taken to enable the vast majority of Arab communities not located in designated areas of development to get assistance for new economic initiatives.

Successful economic development in Arab communities, observes Sikkuy, requires a mix of national government resources and the cooperation of Arab municipalities in furthering local economic initiatives. While municipalities and local entrepreneurs must assume some responsibility, Sikkuy faults the government for not providing the structure that would accelerate progress.

"The government is making a great effort to help the economic development of the West Bank and Gaza," says Sikkuy director Alouph Hareven. "You cannot perceive a parallel effort regarding Israeli Arabs."

The organized Jewish community since the Israeli-PLO Accord has been similarly focused on the welfare of Palestinians in the territories, and has not yet paid sufficient attention to the Arab citizens who will continue to live in Israel. American Jews know well from the American experience the corrosive effects of having a disadvantaged and disenchanted minority. Therefore, all of us should be cognizant of the realities facing Israeli Arabs and their long-term impact on Israeli society as a whole.

Every North American Jew should read the Sikkuy report. As our community begins to pay more attention to Israel's domestic challenges, the situation of Israeli Arabs should be given higher priority. It is time for North American Jews, together with the Israeli government, to heed the calls of Sikkuy and respond to the urgent needs of Israel's Arab citizens.

Days of remembering

Since its founding 46 years ago on Sabbath eve, the fifth day of Iyar, Israel has never celebrated its independence without first shedding tears of remembrance for her many fallen souls.

With the going down of the sun on Yom Hazikaron, the three clarion stars announce the arrival of Yom Ha'atzmaut. It is an emotional union of individual grief with collective gratitudes. And it is also uniquely Jewish, ordering our human responses to follow the elementary canons of morality and menschlichkeit. Before we laugh, we cry. Before we spend, we acknowledge a debt. Before we sing praise, we give thanks.

Like the links on a chain forged in the hottest fire, Yom Hazikaron is preceded by Yom Hashoah. We bow our heads in reverence and we tremble with resolve. Again we mourn the catastrophe of the Holocaust. We reflect again on the fragility of our lives, the suffering throughout Jewish history, and on the inscrutability of G-d's involvement. But as we reflect, we must also concede the miracle of progression through metaphysical time. Yom Hashoah "leads" to Yom Hazikaron and to Yom Ha'atzmaut, just as victimization led to resistance, resistance to defence, and defence to rebirth.

Once granted, life brings its own burdens, the most important of which is its own preservation. Tens of thousands of dead and injured, wounded and scarred, have carried that burden for the State of Israel, which has never known a single day of peace. In the days of remembering, we think of them. We think of the sacrifice they and their families have made and of how it is a debt that can never be repaid.

This is the singular and uncompromising thought guiding Israel's leaders in their search for peace. They know that without security, there can be no peace.

And when next week we celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut, let us recall our bearings. We stand on a narrow ridge, life's precarious but exhilarating perch. We look back with grief, but forward with Hatikvah — the hope — in our heart.

The haunting words of the Jewish partisan express both the sorrow and the resolve:

We'll have the morning sun to set our day aglow,
And all our yesterdays shall vanish with the foe,
And if the time is long before the sun appears,
Then let this song go like a signal through the years.

So never say that there is only death for you.
Leaden skies may be concealing days of blue —
Yet the hour we have hungered for is near;
Beneath our tread the earth shall tremble: We are here!

Belated resolution

Better late than never.

The United Nations Human Rights Commission in Geneva recently saw fit to condemn anti-Semitism, the first such resolution in its history.

Passed unanimously under the leadership of Turkey, and supported by a diverse coalition of nations ranging from Canada and the United States to Germany and Russia, the measure was adopted nearly 50 years after the liberation of the last Nazi death camp in Europe.

The resolution — which also condemns discrimination against blacks, Muslims and Arabs — comes three years after the United Nations repealed the odious and politically-charged 1975 resolution equating Zionism with racism.

One wonders why it took the United Nations almost five decades to categorize anti-Semitism as a phenomenon beyond the pale. Anti-Semitism is as least as old as Christianity, predates Islam, and has been a blight on Western civilization for centuries. Yet, while the United Nations was busy excoriating Israel and demonizing its national liberation movement, Zionism, the same world body somehow deemed anti-Semitism a matter of no real importance.

Lest we forget, anti-Semitism is a malignant cancer which spawned the Inquisition, inspired the Holocaust, and animates neo-Nazis and their ilk today.

Ominously enough, anti-Semitism is growing in Eastern Europe, in the former Soviet republics, and in Germany. On the eve of Passover, vandals firebombed a synagogue in Lubeck, in the first such incident of its kind since Kristallnacht. In the March 31 edition of The Canadian Jewish News, readers learned that a synagogue in Quebec City had been defaced with that most despicable of symbols, the Nazi swastika. South of the border, in the United States, the incidence of anti-Semitic acts and assaults also increased, while Nation of Islam demagogues like Louis Farrakhan and his lieutenant, Khalid Abdul Mohammed, spewed a torrent of anti-Jewish calumnies.

It's clear that anti-Semitism lives on. It will not be eradicated by well-meaning resolutions at the United Nations. But, after all these years, it's encouraging that the United Nations has finally condemned this recurring evil.

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. TORONTO THE KIND

On March 2, 1994, I was reminded of just how kind, warm-hearted and caring Torontonians can be. As I was crossing Viewmount at Bathurst, my foot got trapped in a snow-covered hole, and I fell. Immediately several people came to my rescue.

A TTC driver stopped the bus and asked if he could be of any help. A young female doctor who had been driving by, stopped and checked my leg and ankle and told my husband that we needed to go to the hospital. Mr. Kleinman, a very distinguished gentleman who wouldn't tell us anything other than his name, offered and then drove us to Mount Sinai Hospital. There was also a young man, who attends York University, who carried me to Mr. Kleinman's car. At the hospital, the nurse attending to my leg was extremely gentle and caring. Later at the fracture clinic, Dr. David MacIntosh showed the same warmth and compassion.

I am presently in a cast, but the thought of all these wonderful people has cheered me up a great deal. I would like to thank all of these people from the bottom of my heart. I don't know most of their names, but hopefully they will recognize themselves.

FINDS LETTER OFFENSIVE

The letter from the Vancouver-based Palestinian and Jewish Women for Peace (CJN March 17, 1994) was most offensive.

Why have we not once heard from this group during the five months since the signing of the Declaration of Principles as 30 Jews have been slaughtered by Palestinian Arabs? Where were their voices when Chaim Mizrachi was butchered just outside Beit-El? Why have they been silent during every terrorist attack on Jewish civilians in Israel, Turkey, Argentina and countless other locales?

To target the massacre in Hebron in isolation is a gross obscenity! If their letter is an example of how to "build understanding and trust through dialogue," then I want no part of it!

NOT A DRY EYE

It was very exciting to see the photograph of Dr. Cyril Fine on your editorial page (CJN, February 24). It awakened in me memories of inspiring events.

I met Dr. Fine in Jerusalem in 1990 at the Wolfson Clinic. As a volunteer from Emunah Women, I used to spend time there with the families of recent immigrants from the then Soviet Union who came to undergo brit milah. My "colleagues" and I would spend the day with them, helping the staff make them comfortable, preparing refreshments, chatting with them, holding their hands, and above all, celebrating with them. How uplifting it was to see Jews of all ages, who usually did not have any Jewish background, go joyfully to the operating room in order to enter the Covenant of Abraham. As a 5-year-old put it to me, and I will never forget it, "Today is really my birthday, because today I became a real Jew."

But the kiddush and the Siddurim offered by the Emunah volunteers were greatly enhanced by the presence of Dr. Fine. Dr. Fine is a surgeon, a religious Jew, who did not speak Russian, but always made sure to have someone translate his words. After all the operations were performed, he would speak to each family, in order to choose a Hebrew name according to their wishes and their family memories. One day, we saw him almost dance with joy at the news that one immigrant remembered being a "kohen." He would then address the patients, say the required prayers and give them their Hebrew names. His devotion and enthusiasm were reflected in the way all would repeat the words of the Shema with him: very often there wasn't a dry eye in the ward.

It is wonderful to see that Dr. Fine is still continuing his good deeds, and I wish him good health in registering new records.

END LAXITY ON HEBRON

Yechiel M. Leiter, of the Yesha Council has written an article explaining the Hebron attack. According to Robert I. Friedman, author of a book on Rabbi Meir Kahane, in an article in the Village Voice, the Yesha Council is ". . . the Gush Emunim-dominated Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza. It was a symbolic marriage of the radical right and the so-called respectable right."

Leiter, writing about the causes of the Hebron attack, says the above groups are of ". . . a community of people who have always fostered and worked for peaceful co-existence between Jews and Arabs." He goes on to say that ". . . we have always insisted that there will never be true peace unless Jews have full rights to live in all parts of our homeland [sic]." In other words, they want peace with the Arabs as long as they (the Arabs) play by their rules.

Friedman, writing extensively about the settlers' communities, fleshes out what Leiter means and what some of the leaders of some of these settlers' groups mean by peaceful co-existence. A. David Romanoff, leader of the group, This Is Our Land, is quoted as saying: "A government that cannot follow the basic tenets of the beliefs of the people does not have the right to exist." "The Jewish people have been given jurisdiction over the land by God . . . When there is a contradiction between the law of the Torah and the laws of the land, then we are obliged to follow the law of the Torah." He also says,"We cede not a square centimetre of land."

David Cohen, an American expatriate and member of Kach, one of the settler communities, puts it a little more bluntly. "It says in Numbers 33 that we will inherit the land. Inherit means that you don't inherit the inhabitants. It is inferred that you will move out the inhabitants."

Another settler, Eitan Ben David indicates they wouldn't be too fussy as to how they would remove the Palestinians. "With guns, with cannons."

I am a secular Jew who believes in the supremacy of the democratically elected Knesset and the laws they pass. These people are entitled to their beliefs concerning the supremacy of the Torah. But they should be prevented from carrying out their beliefs by the use of force, "With guns, with cannons."

It is apparent until now that the Israeli government has turned a blind eye to the atrocities committed by these settlers' groups. (And that is not to say that the Arabs have not also committed equally horrible acts.) The Hebron attack proves that this laxity is no longer possible for a government that professes it wants to proceed with the peace process.

Shooting at people, not targets

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

Next time you go to the movie theatre be sure to take a good look at the preview which precedes the show itself. Chances are that you will see someone being blown up. It is the kind of image which is supposed to make you eager to spend your cash and time so that you can behold the spectacle in the fullness of its gore.

I am always surprised when I read that there are still some analysts who believe that such movies on the big screen in the theatre or the small one at home have no perceptible influence on the children we raise. It seems to me that the common perception of the rest of us must be right: You teach by example, and the screen and the tube are the major teachers of our age; they have replaced the home as the child's main instructor.

My colleague, Rabbi Herbert Bronstein of Glencoe, Illinois, recently put some of his observations on the subject in print, and they are worth repeating:

In the past, the radical rise in the number of violent deaths of children in our society would have been considered a bizarre anomaly, evoking astonished horror. They are now as commonplace and routine on the daily news, day in, day out, as the daily weather reports.

"The boy and his gun" has replaced "the boy and his dog." With shotguns available for $25, sawed-off and turned into automatic weapons, teenagers now repay their petty vengeances by shooting up cars as entertainment — or the homes or front porches of people they do not like. A young woman whose life-long ambition is to teach kindergarten, is shot while playing softball, by a teenager from a passing elevator train. Why? "Like I saw it in the movies," he confessed. In Kansas City a 15-year-old pulled out a gun in the movie house and shot his mother to death. A man in Washington, D.C., shot five people because someone had bumped him on the dance floor. A young man pulled up next to another car and shot the person in the driver's seat because he did not like the music. In the U.S. capital a survey of first and second graders (six and seven year olds!) reveals that nearly one-third had witnessed shootings and thirty-nine per cent had seen the dead bodies of those who were murdered.

Rabbi Plaut

Guns are there for the asking, and guns are for shooting. There is an old adage which says: There is no gun that sooner or later will not be fired. The question used to be only where and why — today it is, why not?

I cite these observations not in order to characterize Americans as a morally unstable nation, with habits that we in Canada have fortunately not yet embraced. Alas, there is no room for false superiority, for it is also obvious that we rush to imitate most everything south of the border and especially when television portrays it for us. Violence has come to Canada too. Patience — in time we will catch up as we usually do.

Which is to say that violence is becoming a normal and expected aspect of the way North Americans handle the resolution of their problems. The Wild West has now become the Wild Middle West and East; it covers the landscape. In the United States, the National Rifle Association has a powerful lobby, not only because it is immensely rich, but also because people like their guns despite all the dreadful statistics which they read or experience. Now another reason has been added for buying a weapon: defend yourself against your neighbor, for you never know when he will peek through his kitchen window and find you an attractive target.

Unfortunately, this culture has become an export item. Mass murderer Baruch Goldstein was after all a New York Jew, and the movement to which he gave his allegiance was American born in the very violence of its objectives.

Koheleth says that there is a season for everything, a time for every experience under heaven . . . a time for slaying and a time for healing.

Those who think that the time for healing is now may still be in the minority. But slowly and inexorably they will say: "Enough!" and will draw the consequences. Maybe it will happen sooner in Israel, amongst both Arabs and Jews, than it will in North America. In either case, it couldn't happen soon enough.

Auntie Rosie: an integral part of our family

By JUDITH RUBINSTEIN

I remember the wonderful summers I spent in my grandparents' home, the special attention and the firm but loving discipline my maternal grandma gave me. She was a very special lady who helped me through the trials and tribulations of growing up.

Her approval of any decision I had to make was very important to me. When my own children were growing up, they missed the love and emotional support only grandparents can give.

While they were very young, they didn't really know what they were missing, although I did. It was more difficult for me to raise them without the support and loving care of grandparents.

Unfortunately, our whole family consisted only of young adults. The entire older generation was wiped out by the horrors of World War II.

The real problems started when the children entered the school system. All of a sudden they realized that the other children had something they had never heard of: grandparents — bubbies and zaides — whom they visited or who came to visit them. And with whom they exchanged gifts. All this made them aware that they were missing an important part of the family structure.

They often came home from school complaining. "Why?" they wanted to know. It was very difficult for me to explain, as they were still too young to understand the tragedy that shadowed our lives.

Then a miracle happened. The Hungarian Revolution started in 1956. The borders were open for a short while, and freedom-loving people left the country. Many of them arrived in Toronto: a mass of tired, frustrated people without a trade, money or knowledge of the English language, and no support from family or friends.

The Canadian government did its best to accommodate them, but it was extremely difficult to absorb so many immigrants in such a short time. While they were looking for job opportunities and a place to live, they were sheltered temporarily at the Red Cross building, where they received the basic necessities.

Since I had been a newcomer only a few years earlier, I understood and sympathized with their multitude of problems very well.

I started to visit them regularly, offering assistance with language, housing, registering of children in school; or just listening to their problems and complaints. I tried my best to help, but most of the issues were too big for me to resolve.

The most important part of my role, and that of other former Hungarians, was the encouragement we tried to give. We were sympathetic to the plight of these new immigrants, and told them that all would pass in good time.

On my very first visit to the centre, I met an elderly couple. They were frightened and lonely. I felt as if I had known them for a long time. The woman was a very intelligent, very sensitive person, with a good sense of humor. The husband was just the opposite, already regretting that he had left the security and familiarity of his former home. He worried terribly about how he would make a living without a trade or any knowledge of English.

To ease their misery, I invited them to our house, and they became part of our weekends and holidays. Our son Eli was eight, and Rochelle was three at the time. They fell in love with the friendly couple instantly. "Auntie Rosie," as they called her, showered them with hugs and kisses, without being able to talk to them.

The children felt the love being lavished on them, and gave the couple all their attention in return.

Then one day, my daughter came to me with a great idea. "Mummy," she told me, "I want Auntie Rosie to be my grandmother."

I was stunned for a minute by the strange request; then I realized what a wonderful solution this would be to fill the gap of the missing grandparents.

By that time, Auntie Rosie had a reasonable command of the English language and Rochelle's Hungarian had improved. The very next opportunity she had, she shyly approached Auntie Rosie with the question, "Auntie Rosie, would you like to be my grandma, please?"

I watched the surprise and pleasure in Auntie Rosie's face, and then, with a big smile, she picked up the child, and replied with tears in her eyes, "Yes, darling, it will be an honor to be your grandma."

And so we acquired a grandma whose caring is genuine and sincere.

A few years later, Rosie's husband passed away. The bond she had with our family became even stronger.

Now that my children are married, they bring their children to visit Auntie Rosie, who lives in a retirement home. In every family get-together, we include her as a member of the family. As with any grandmother, when her "grandchildren" come to visit, she proudly presents them to her friends, and she carries their pictures with her at all times.

First seder initiated Warsaw Ghetto revolt

By SAM LIPSHITZ

For hundreds of years Jews have followed the custom of sitting down to the seder on the first evening of Passover. But, before one sits down to eat, it is also the custom for the youngest member of the family to ask the fir kashes (the four questions), the first of which asks, "why is this night different from all the other nights of the year?"

This same question was also asked on the evening of April 19, 1943, in the Warsaw Ghetto. But, not at a traditionally bedecked seder table but on the roofs and walls and in the bunkers, at the barricades and all the defensive positions. And the answer given was, "On this night we raise our weapons in resistance to the Nazis."

That first seder evening initiated the greatest physical and moral battle in the history of the murderously-depleted Polish Jewish community. It was also a battle that proved to be one of the most important in the war against Hitlerism.

In the destruction and flames that spread from block to block, the resistance of the young fighters presented the world and the Nazis with the spirit of the liberty and freedom they hoped a new, post-Nazi world would reflect. Though no match for the Nazis in sheer force of armament, the young held out for months and left the Nazis shaken. Hitler's minions knew that even though the ghetto guns were finally silenced theirs was not a complete victory. Hundreds of Jews were smuggled out to the "other side" and would bear witness to the story of the Jewish fighters who bearded the Nazi war machine and showed that Jews would resist and could resist.

Their resistance shattered the stereotype of the Jew so carefully cultivated by Hitler, Himmler and Goebbels. Their resistance stopped the forward march of the General Jurgen Stroop — who looked at the easy liquidation of the Warsaw ghetto as a step up in his career. That same General Stroop was hung as a war criminal in that same Warsaw ghetto he could not spiritually break.

The heroism of the Warsaw ghetto fighters and the struggle of the Allies against Hitlerism laid the foundation for the greatest occurance in modern Jewish history — the establishment of the State of Israel.

Let none of us become so jaded that the telling and retelling of the story of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising and the destruction of East European Jewry with its rich culture and social institutions is put out of our minds when we tell the Passover story.

Let us never forget the 43,000 Warsaw ghetto Jews who honored us all by their resistance. Let us never forget the six million who perished in the horror of the Nazi death camps. In our hearts must forever burn the fire of hate for the Nazis who were and for the Nazis who are — those who could again subject the world to war, racial hatred and anti-Semitism.

The Holocaust in Hungary

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Fifty years ago last month, Nazi Germany invaded Hungary, its putative ally, and unleashed a reign of terror that decimated Hungary's Jewish community.

Until March 19, 1944, the day of the German occupation, Hungarian Jewry had been relatively insulated from the Holocaust.

True, Jews had been humiliated and persecuted by anti-Semitic Hungarian governments — stripped of their civil rights, robbed of their wealth and forced into labor battalions.

Furthermore, between the summer of 1941 and the winter of 1942, German SS troops, aided by the Hungarian military, murdered tens of thousands of Jews in Galicia (Kamenets-Podolski) and in Yugoslavia (Novi Sad).

By the time the German army marched into Hungary, 63,000 Jews in Hungary and in territories controlled by Hungary had already been killed.

According to the Encyclopedia of the Holocaust, edited by Israel Guttman, Hungary's Jewish population in 1941 was 725,000, or nearly 5 per cent of the total populace.

Of this number, approximately 400,000 Jews lived within the boundaries of Hungary as it had been mapped out under the Treaty of Trianon after World War I. Under this treaty, Hungary lost about two-thirds of its land and many of its inhabitants.

The remaining Jews resided in Hungarian-occupied areas seized from Czechoslovakia, Romania and Yugoslavia from 1938 to 1941.

In addition, Hungary was home to about 100,000 persons — converts and Christians of Jewish origin -- who were racially classified as Jews and therefore subjected to discriminatory legislation, the first of which had been enacted in 1920.

Hungarian regimes stripped Jews of their rights

The law of 1920, which restricted the admission of Jewish students into universities, went into effect after Miklos Horthy deposed a short-lived left-wing regime headed by Bela Kun, a Jew. Horthy was the dominant political figure in Hungary, the regent, from 1920 to 1944.

Widely popular, Horthy's authoritarian regime was mildly to overtly anti-Semitic. Under his leadership, Hungary formed close economic and political relations with Nazi Germany. With German backing, the Hungarians redrew their borders at the expense of their neighbors.

Beholden to Germany as a result of these territorial rewards, Hungary entered into a formal alliance with Berlin and its allies, Italy and Japan, and declared war on the Soviet Union. By 1942, the bulk of the Hungarian army was fighting alongside Germany on the Eastern front.

Not unexpectedly, Hungary's dalliance with Germany had domestic repercussions.

Before the 1930s, reactionary politicians, supported mainly by the lower middle-class and the army, had long been calling for anti-Semitic policies to curtail Jewish influence, both in the economy and in the cultural life of the nation.

Conservative and aristocratic elements in the ruling class opposed such chauvinistic appeals, believing they would be counter-productive, writes Nathaniel Katzburg in Hungary and the Jews.

During the 1930s, as the Depression intensified and instability loomed, Hungary's elite panicked and abandoned the Jewish community to its fate.

From 1938 to 1941, the Hungarian government promulgated three increasingly harsh anti-Jewish laws which gradually reduced the Jews' role in the economy to six per cent, identified Jews in racial terms and conscripted Jewish men of military age into forced labor units.

These edicts, Katzburg writes, ruptured "the community of interests" which had existed between Jews and Magyars.

At this point, he adds, the Jewish question was primarily a socio-economic issue, to which the "appropriate solution" was the limitation of the proportion of Jews in particular occupations. The very existence of Jews in Hungary was not questioned, as it would be in the penultimate year of the war.

Thus, in 1942 and 1943, Horthy rejected German pressure to impose still harsher measures — the exclusion of Hungarian Jews from all economic activities, the mandatory wearing of the infamous yellow star, ghettoization and, finally, deportation.

However, in deference to local anti-Semitic radicals and Germany, the leader of the fascist Arrow Cross party, Ferenc Szalasi, was released from prison, and the ban barring civil servants from joining extremist parties was lifted.

With Germany's catastrophic defeat at the Battle of Stalingrad in 1943, and with Hungarian casualties on the Eastern front fast escalating, Hungary's prime minister, Miklos Kallay, began to search for ways to extricate Hungary from the war and join forces with the Western allies in opposition to Germany.

In line with this policy, Kallay consistently rejected German demands that Hungary take part in the Final Solution. Indeed, Jewish leaders pinned their hopes on Kallay's and Horthy's ability to keep the Germans at bay.

With the Red Army closing in on Hungary, Hitler launched Operation Margaret. On March 18, 1944, Hitler invited Horthy to Germany and informed him that a German invasion was imminent.

On March 22, Kallay was dismissed and replaced with Dome Sztojay, a pro-German figure whose government was riddled with anti-Semitic collaborators. Among his ministers were some of Hungary's most notorious anti-Jewish demagogues, Laszlo Endre, Laszlo Baky and Laszlo Ferenczy.

As expected, Sztojay's quisling regime adopted a rash of anti-Jewish decrees. This greatly pleased the special German task force which had been ordered to deal decisively with the so-called Jewish problem.

The German team was composed of Adolf Eichmann, Hermann Krumey, Dieter Wisliceny, Edmund Veesenmayer and Otto Winkelmann.

At their behest, the Gestapo immediately arrested 200 Jewish doctors and lawyers in Budapest, and whisked them off to the Mauthausen concentration camp in Austria.

According to historian Martin Gilbert, the Gestapo then fanned out into the countryside and began to prepare voluminous lists of Jews who would be subject to deportation.

By means of deception, Eichmann and his cohorts succeeded in convincing some Jewish leaders that Germany had no evil designs on the community. "After the war," he told a meeting, "the Jews would be free to do whatever they wanted."

Pathetically seduced by Eichmann's soothing words, one Jewish leader, Fulop Freudiger, noted in a letter to a colleague: "I do not believe that we shall suffer the same fate that befell Polish Jews. We shall have to give up our wealth, we must be prepared for many struggles and deprivations, but I am not worried for our lives."

He should have been.

By April 1944, the Sztojay regime had enacted Draconian legislation which isolated Jews in ghettos, deprived them of their property, valuables and livelihood, and forced them to wear the dreaded yellow star.

Ghettoization started in the provinces, mainly affecting pious Jews in Ruthenia and Transylvania, and gradually spread to the rest of the country outside Budapest.

The next step in the gruesome process, deportation, which culminated in genocide, got under way in mid-May. Between May 15 and July 9, about 434,000 Jews from 55 centres were shipped in freight cars to Auschwitz. Historians agree that the deportations were a joint effort of the German and Hungarian authorities.

On July 7, with over 150,000 Hungarian Jews still alive, Horthy, anxious to ingratiate himself with the Allies, ordered the deportations stopped. In fact, they continued for two days, sweeping away Jewish communites in western Hungary and around Budapest.

Shortly afterward, Horthy offered to allow several categories of Jews to emigrate, primarily to Palestine. The Allies were receptive, but Germany balked. Consequently, Horthy's manoeuvre collapsed.

However, the Germans were not totally resistant to rescue efforts, provided there was something in it for them. In the final months of the war, Eichmann and Wisliceny were involved in negotiations with Hungarian Jewish leaders such as Joel Brand and Rezso Kasztner, observes University of Toronto scholar Michael Marrus in The Holocaust in History.

Kasztner cut a deal with the Germans which saved several thousand Jews. But Eichmann's talks with Brand on exchanging the lives of one million Jews in return for 10,000 trucks and other materials proved inconclusive.

Horthy's intervention in extermination was just a reprieve

As it turned out, Horthy's intervention in the extermination process was merely a reprieve.

On Oct. 15, 1944, following an abortive attempt to sign a peace agreement with the Allies, Horthy was deposed by the Germans. Szalasi, the rabid Arrow Cross fuhrer, took over. The Arrow Cross proceeded to terrorize, rob and kill Jews in Budapest. Thousands more were deported and sent on death marches.

In December, a month before Hungary was liberated, 70,000 Jews were squeezed into a ghetto near the venerable Dohany Street synagogue. Untold numbers succumbed to disease, starvation and the cold.

In what was a glimmer of light in the darkness, Raoul Wallenberg — a Swedish diplomat of Jewish descent — saved many Jews in the capital by extending the protection of the Swedish embassy.

The war years were disastrous for Hungarian Jewry. The Encyclopedia of the Holocaust estimates that 564,500 Jews perished during the war — 63,000 before Germany's occupation, and 501,000 after that. Of these, about 267,000 were from post-1918 Hungary: 85,000 from Budapest; 182,000 from the provinces; and 233,000 from Hungarian territories in Romania, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia.

For almost five years after Germany invaded Poland in 1939, the Jews of Hungary were more or less able to stave off the Final Solution. But with Germany's invasion, and a fiercely anti-Semitic Hungarian regime in place, the Holocaust finally swept over the Jewish community.

Mideast Analysis

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

In the past two years, Israel has broken out of its diplomatic isolation — forging relations with the Vatican, China, India and a host of other developing nations, re-establishing ties with black African and Eastern European countries, opening new embassies in former Soviet republics and sowing the seeds of future co-operation with Morocco, Jordan and the Gulf states.

Amid the rush of these developments, Israel's evolving relationship with Turkey — the first Muslim country to recognize Israel back in 1949 — has either been consigned to the back pages or completely ignored by the media.

This is a glaring oversight, since Turkey — a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and a former colonial power in the region — is one of the most important players in the Middle East.

Recognizing Turkey's geo-political importance as a non-Arab Muslim state, David Ben-Gurion — Israel's first and greatest prime minister — courted Turkey. The Turks were slow to respond. Out of solidarity with the Muslim world, Turkey voted against the 1947 United Nations Palestine partition plan. But after the 1948-49 Arab-Israeli war, Israel and Turkey entered into formal relations, which, in the words of one Israeli observer, followed "a roller-coaster course."

Following the signing of the Baghdad Pact with Iraq in 1955, Turkey scaled back relations with Israel. After Israel's 1956 war with Egypt, Turkey recalled its minister from its legation in Tel Aviv. In return for Arab support during a crisis in Cyprus in the early 1960s, Turkey reduced relations with Israel yet again.

In 1980, after the Knesset passed a law reaffirming Jerusalem's status as Israel's undivided capital, Turkey showed displeasure by withdrawing its charge d'affaires and leaving its legation in the hands of a lowly second secretary.

Turkey warmed up to Israel after a civilian government replaced the military regime in the mid-1980s. The volume of trade increased, as did the flow of Israeli tourists.

Since then, two major events in the annals of the Middle East have enhanced Israel's profile in Ankara — the convening of the Madrid peace conference in 1991 and Israel's 1993 agreement with the PLO.

Israel and Turkey

In March 1992, Israel and Turkey upgraded ties to the ambassadorial level. Several months later, Chaim Herzog visited Turkey, the first by an Israeli president. It was billed as an unofficial trip, but for all intents and purposes, it was a state visit.

The commander of the Israeli Air Force, Gen. Herzl Bodinger, paid an official trip to Turkey last August, the first by a senior Israeli officer. The chief topic of discussion was military co-operation.

In November 1993, Hikmet Cetin became the first Turkish foreign minister to set foot on Israeli soil. Cetin and his Israeli counterpart, Shimon Peres, signed a series of economic and cultural accords. While in Jerusalem, Cetin presented Peres with a draft agreement on security co-operation against terrorism and drug trafficking. For the past few years, Israel and Turkey have shared intelligence about Syria. Turkey's ties with Syria are strained in a dispute over the waters of the Euphrates River and Syria's tacit support of anti-Turkish Kurdish rebels.

The visit to Turkey of Israeli President Ezer Weizman two months ago was the most recent sign that Israeli-Turkish relations are on the upswing.

Focusing on economic and industrial co-operation with Turkey, Weizman met with President Suleiman Demirel and Prime Minister Tansu Ciller.

Accompanied by a top-level delegation of businessmen, some from Israel's military industries, Weizman reportedly discussed a possible $500 million deal under which Israeli companies would upgrade Turkey's fleet of American-built F-4 Phantoms and F-5 fighter-bombers.

Water was also on the agenda. Like most Middle Eastern states, Israel is short of water. Turkey, however, is awash in it, and the importation of Turkish water by pipeline to Israel seems like an area of likely co-operation in the future.

With the garnering of seven Academy Awards, Schindler's List will surely find its place in the list of Western movie classics. For Jews, though, the movie resonates with deeper meaning a point emphasized by the timing of the awards ceremony. Hollywood crowned the movie in Nisan, the month that plays such an important role in Jewish life with the celebration of Pesach and the commemoration of Yom Hashoah (Holocaust Day).

The Jewish calendar plays a very significant role in Judaism. It calls upon the Jew to celebrate or commemorate an important event and often at the same time, to relive an experience of the past. In Jewish life, history is not something that is relegated to the musty pages of a limited circulation academic tome. Our history stimulates us to observe the rituals, laws and customs which have withstood the test of time and remain essential to our survival as a vibrant, dynamic nation in Israel and a Jewish community in the Diaspora. There is a classic statement that declares "only the people that honor and glorify the past will be able to perpetuate its future."

Schindler's List reminds the entire world that it did not care and did nothing to help during the Holocaust. Unbelievably, even now, just 50 years later, there are still many people who want to deny that these atrocities took place.

Even after the ghetto walls broke down and there was no longer a hundred per cent commitment to all aspects of Judaism, the Jewish community was still filled with religious fervor and cultural commitment to Jewish life in so many different ways. Beginning with the mass immigration in 1882 to North America and on a smaller scale to Israel, the Eastern European Jews were responsible for creating the North American Jewish community and were directly responsible, in conjunction with their Sephardi brethren, for the establishment of Israel.

The days of Pesach and Yom Hashoah call upon the Jews to remember our past and relive it in our daily life. Chaim Weizmann who was not a particularly observant Jew, once declared that since a third of our people were killed in the Holocaust, the Jews themselves must become a third more observant, knowledgeable and committed to the Jewish way of life. In recalling the European community, we should remember that it was one of the most intense and fully observant Jewish societies of all times. For the Jew, then, it is a religious obligation to remember not only the Holocaust but also the eastern European community which was destroyed in it.

In Europe, Judaism flourished amidst suffering and persecution. In North America, although there are far too many instances of anti-Semitism, hopefully there is no physical danger to our survival. Instead, we must battle to maintain our spiritual survival. Continuity has become a very important word and concept today. We must not pay lip-service to it, but make sure that our children get a meaningful Jewish education, which also includes their seeing adults as proper Jewish role models. Without this emphasis on Jewish education, we may be guilty of the terrible sin of handing over to Hitler a posthumous victory.

Israel, which is strong militarily must be equally concerned with its spiritual vigor. Living in Israel is not enough by itself to maintain a strong Jewish identity. Only by sowing the spiritual seeds and revitalizing our Jewish roots will we sanctify the lives of the victims of the Holocaust and ensure that the holy ones will always be in our hearts and minds. More importantly though we will ensure our future as a strong unified people governed by the values that have led us through the ages.

Rabbis urge soldiers to disobey

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israel's National Religious Party is in turmoil over rabbinical calls to soldiers to disobey orders to evacuate Jews from Hebron.

A trio of rabbis last week issued a halachic pronouncement saying that orders to evacuate Jews from that West Bank town are "a sin equivalent to the eating of pork."

The three rabbis — former Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Avraham Shapira, Moshe Zvi Neriya and Shaul Yisraeli — are seen as the NRP's spiritual guides, although the party does not have a supreme rabbinical council as do the Orthodox Agudath Yisrael and Shas parties.

There have been increased calls for the removal of the approximately 400 settlers living among 70,000 Palestinians in Hebron since the Feb. 25 mosque massacre at the Tomb of the Patriarchs.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, in remarks to reporters, branded the rabbis' call to disobey army orders as marking "the beginning of the destruction of the (Israel Defence Force) and of the security of the state."

Rabin added that calls by rabbis "or any other elements," are tantamount to "the destruction of the basic fabric of Israeli society."

But NRP Knesset member Yitzhak Levy endorsed the halachic pronouncement as the official line of the party.

"We are behind the rabbis, without any hesitation," said Levy, one of six NRP officials serving in the Knesset.

Levy's endorsement immediately provoked other NRP Knesset members — including the parliamentary faction's chairman, Yigal Bibi, and former cabinet ministers Zevulun Hammer and Avner-Hai Shaki — to protest and demand a meeting with the rabbis to clarify the issue.

Bibi previously made clear his stance on the matter of disregarding clear army directives when he publicly stated, "I could not ask my son, a brigade commander, to disobey orders."

Rabbi Yosef Burg, the NRP's elder statesman and a longtime former interior minister, strongly condemned the rabbis' statement.

"This is a political matter," he said, adding, "I reject the rabbis who made such a pronouncement. It is religiously unacceptable."

Secular right-wing parties, including Likud and Tsomet, have sharply rejected the rabbinical ruling, as have the Labor Party and its coalition partner, Meretz.

"I cannot condone disobedience to legal orders," said Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu.

"There must be total obedience by soldiers. Our problem is that this government is pushing a major segment of the population into a corner and is causing a rift which might be impossible to repair."

The fervently religious Shas party and the United Torah Judaism bloc have so far remained silent on the issue.

York Region to postpone start of school year

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Following two hours of impassioned speeches on tolerance, sensitivity and the importance of Rosh Hashanah, trustees of the York Region Board of Education last week voted to delay the start of the 1994-1995 school year until after the Jewish new year.

By a 12-8 vote at the standing-room-only meeting, trustees approved what they called a compromise: instead of beginning the next academic year on Sept. 6, the first day of Rosh Hashanah — as had been originally scheduled — the school year will start on Sept. 8.

The compromise will have no effect on Jewish students, who will be spared missing the first two days of classes. Instead, Jewish teachers and staff will be affected, since trustees approved closing schools Sept. 6 and making Sept. 7 a Professional Activity (PA) day, meaning Jewish staff will have to make up that day.

Nevertheless, the decision was welcomed by B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), which began lobbying the board months ago to delay the start of the year in order to accommodate Jewish students, parents and staff.

In effect, the trustees voted to overturn a decision reached earlier by the board's standing committee on the school year.

Last month, the sub-committee voted to disregard the recommendations of the board's race relations committee, which in a 14-page study warned that starting school Sept. 6 would be "extremely disruptive" to Jewish pupils and staff, leave them "ill-prepared," and force them to choose between their faith and school. [CJN, March 17].

BBC and CJC agreed, saying Jewish students would be placed at an unfair disadvantage if they missed the key first two days of school.

Congress had asked Ontario Education Minister David Cooke to intervene, but Cooke directed individual boards to deal with the matter, as long as the required number of school days was met.

Presentations from the community-at-large implored trustees to realize that this was not just a Jewish issue, but would send a message about how all minorities are treated.

It was pointed out that the coincidence of Rosh Hashanah and the first two days of school has not happened in recent memory and likely would not reoccur for decades.

"It's a virtually once in a lifetime occurrence," remarked Ellen Cole, vice-chair of the community relations committee of CJC's Ontario region.

The first two days of school are of "vital importance in terms of orientation and socialization," especially for younger children, Cole said.

Starting the year Sept. 8 would not set a precedent for accommodating the holidays of other faiths, she argued.

Cole noted that five of the six Metro Toronto school boards have chosen to delay the start of the school year so as not to conflict with Rosh Hashanah. The sole exception is the Scarborough board.

The same sentiments were echoed by Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of BBC.

"We believe that rescheduling [the start of the year] is of concern not only to Jews but to all members of the community at large," Dimant said in his presentation.

Alan Shefman and Hugh McKeown, representing the board's race relations advisory committee, noted that at no time was the "do nothing" option — beginning the year Sept. 6 — recommended by the committee.

They pointed out that starting on Sept. 6 would also affect Jewish teachers and would require the board to take on supply staff at the daily rate of roughly $170 for each person hired.

"This is not a matter of giving in ... of giving importance to one faith over another," said McKeown. "This is a matter of treating people fairly and equally."

While no presenter argued against the delay, several trustees did.

Trustee Harry Bowes of Whitchurch-Stouffville said he knows "lots" of parents who don't send their children to school for the first few days, and that he "really objects" to charges of discrimination.

Trustee Brenda Hogg of Richmond Hill was roundly jeered when she said she fears "anger and frustration" would be directed at the Jewish community if the year was delayed. She said she doesn't think her community is ready for the change.

Trustee Susan Kadis of Thornhill called the vote a "breakthrough" and later told The CJN she is "very proud" to serve on the board.

Imaging Ourselves: Creating Self-Esteem

Society puts an enormous amount of pressure on women of all ages to conform to a stereotype. The image seen in magazines, advertisements, movies and television is an unrealistical portrayal of feminine beauty. And this is the image to which our daughters are trying to conform.

Carla Rice, Body Image consultant at Women's College Hospital, laments what she refers to as "the invisibility of the majority of women in our culture because of the prevalence of the thin, blond, young ideal." Rice hits home when she says, "Women are so very beautiful in all our diversity. The narrowing down of all women to a single constructed and, for the most part, unreal standard of beauty is demeaning to women."

Paediatricians today experience the frustration of watching healthy young patients deliberately starving themselves to meet this standard. Dr. Diane Sacks, columnist for the Toronto Star and Teen Clinic physician, claims that eating disorders do not simply involve the individual but are a family issue. Poor self-image and image anxiety in a parent can be unintentionally transmitted to young children.

Awareness is the first step to renewed self-esteem. When up to 15% of female teens have symptoms of bulimia, it is urgent that we examine the causes and take steps for prevention.

Young Jewish women ... at greater risk

Young Jewish women seem to be at greater risk because of the ethnic stereotyping that damages their self-esteem. Paula Caplan, psychologist and author of Don't Blame Mother, finds that Jewish women are confronted with the destructive, negative images in their own culture and the society-at-large. These negative images, perpetuated by "JAP" and Jewish mother jokes, promote ethnic blending and the desire to not act or look "too Jewish."

When we decrease the negative imagery of Jewish women and increase the visibility of all women, women will begin to be valued and accepted as they are and, thus, women will value themselves. As Gloria Steinem said in her book, Revolution from Within, "Self-esteem isn't everything; it's just that there's nothing without it..."

Education and Advocacy First Priority for JWF

The Social and Political Action Committee of Jewish Women's Federation has presented programming that empowers women to learn, to take charge and where necessary, to promote change. In past years, programs have successfully presented issues of importance such as raising a mensch, violence against women, women's health care, and the feminization of poverty, and have brought about ongoing advocacy on behalf of these issues.

"Enriching our community is one of our prime concerns" says Glennie Lindenberg, president of JWF. "By bringing to the community issues of importance to Jewish women we are fulfilling a vital part of our mandate."

On Thursday, May 5, the Social and Political Action Committee of Jewish Women's Federation will again challenge the community to become pro-actively involved in a topic that concerns us all.

Women's Image: Beyond the Looking Glass — Challenging Perceptions for Ourselves and Our Daughters is the title of this year's program. What are society's perceptions of women, in particular Jewish women, and what are these perceptions doing to the self-image and self-esteem of ourselves and our daughters? We must realize the damage that is being done and then learn how to become advocates for change.

"Jewish women have always been leaders in areas of social concern and we, as a group, can be effective in mobilizing change," insists Jill Reitman, vice-president of JWF.

Co-chairs of the evening, Agi Mandel and Gaye Lefebvre are excited by the positive response they have already received. "These issues seem to be hitting a nerve with women of all ages."

Report recommends tougher anti-hate laws

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Canada's anti-hate laws should be strengthened with sentencing provisions that increase the penalties for racially motivated crimes, and membership in a hate group ought to be a criminal offence.

These were two recommendations in a report recently released by the Metropolitan Council co-ordinating committee to combat hate group activity and racist attacks.

The report contains a total of 38 recommendations made by panelists at a November 1993 community forum on combatting racism. The panelists included representatives from the Canadian Jewish Congress, the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights, the Chinese Canadian National Council, the 519 Church Community Centre, the Ministry of the Attorney General and the Hate Crimes Unit of the Metropolitan Toronto Police Force.

Among legislative changes called for in the report are additions to the Criminal Code, making the desecration of religious institutions and cemetaries a crime and Holocaust denial an offence.

The report recommends that the attorney general be more "assertive" in enforcing the section of the Criminal Code that deals with hate crimes by "encouraging the police to lay charges under the anti-hate law provisions if the police believe that they have sufficient evidence to proceed to trial." Since 1972, it states, the anti-hate laws have been used only twice in Metro Toronto.

Metro councillor Bev Salmon, chair of the action committee to combat racism, said the co-ordinating committee has requested a meeting with Ontario's attorney general to discuss the role of the criminal justice system in combatting racism.

She added that the action committee and Metro Council recently endorsed a resolution of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities regarding hate-motivated crime. "This resolution makes recommendations to the criminal justice system and all levels of government. The contents of the resolution, I am pleased to say, are very similar to those contained in our forum report."

Victims of hate activity and their families should be offered counselling, according to the report, "as victims of racial violence often become depressed, isolated, fearful of society and sometime violent towards their own family members." Providing victims with legal advice and a companion when they go to court were other proposals.

Some of the committee's other recommendations are that:

- Training in anti-racism be made mandatory for police, judges and social workers.
- Victim assistance programs be offered in languages other than English.
- Telephone hotlines be set up by community-based agencies to provide victims with a "safe" place to call and the agencies be supported in the compilation of statistics.
- School principals document hate group activities and racial incidents.
- Anti-racism principles be built into teachers and principals' performance appraisal and they should be disciplined for racism or failing to respond to racist activities.

Victoria bans distribution of racist material at city hall

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Victoria city council has banned the distribution of racist literature at city hall and in all city-administered buildings.

The ban was approved by the council because a local "novelty" publication, the Daily Victorian, which is published weekly, carried what city councillors termed a racist column by Doug Collins, a Vancouver writer. The publication has been distributed free at city hall but distribution will no longer be permitted.

Collins, who does a column for Vancouver's North Shore News, has long been criticized by Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region and others in the Jewish community for his views on Jewish matters. His March 16 column in the Daily Victorian was highly critical of Schindler's List and claimed that "what happened to the Jews during World War II is not only the longest lasting but the most effective propaganda exercise ever . . . Hardly a day goes by that press, radio and television don't mention something about the six million. The figure is nonsense but media folk go on parroting what everyone 'knows.' I used to do the same."

Councillor Bob Friedland, the only Jewish member of Victoria's city council, raised the issue of the Collins column with council, calling it "the vilest anti-Semitic crap that I have ever seen in a mainstream publication in Canada. People in the city have been very deeply hurt and concerned about this." He said the community should be assured that city hall will not disseminate hatred and racism.

Councillor Helen Hughes described the March 16 column as "one of the most prejudicial articles I have ever seen." Councillor Laura Acton told The CJN the column was definitely racist in tone and "we cannot tolerate it."

Friedland told The CJN he is a proponent of free speech but "in many ways I differ from other people who say free speech should be limited." Collins, he added, has the right to think and say what he wants — but the column should not be distributed in city hall.

The Daily Victorian is a broadsheet, with a circulation claimed to be 8,000. It carries news dating back to the beginning of the century, but the columns of the paper are interspersed with some current community news. In the masthead it invites correspondents "to express your thoughts and opinions." The lead story of the March 15 issue was bannered "155,000 Russian troops perish," and was datelined St. Petersburg, March 15, 1905.

Making the going easier

The Institute for Community Education and Referral, conceived and funded by Benjamin's, was created in 1986. Benjamin's felt that the sanctity of life demonstrated in treatment of the deceased had to be reflected in greater care for the living as well. The Institute fills, in part, the vacuum left by vanishing traditions of community support for people adjusting to great or sudden personal loss.

The Institute serves as an educational resource on death, funeral practices and Jewish laws and traditions, in addition to helping with needed attention. Individuals or families served by the Chapel may receive clinical assessments, short-term psychological support or referrals to accredited professionals upon request or at the suggestion of the director at the time arrangements are made. Counselling costs are either fully borne or subsidized by Benjamin's to reduce any barrier to help.

Several mailings describing the Institute's services are sent out well after a funeral. Some people need time before recognizing the need for, or accepting professional help. Families occasionally contact the agency for help in coping before a loss occurs. Whatever information or clinical services may be required, the Benjamin Institute is a unique community resource dedicated to facilitating the way life goes on.

Assimilation a common problem for Jews everywhere: Hartman

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In trying to reconcile modernity with Judaism, Rabbi David Hartman has discovered that, although they may not know it yet, Jews everywhere share the same single, overriding concern.

The baggage that comes with modernity — assimilation — threatens not only Disapora Jewry, but also Jews in Israel, where not even a Jewish state can alone guarantee that future generations will be Jewish, he says.

"One cannot assume the loyalty of the next generation," warns Rabbi Hartman, head of the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem, a leading think tank dedicated to the premise that pluralism and Judaism can coexist. "A deeper sense of commitment is needed now, but one with content. Continuity requires content, not simple formulas. When you worry about continuity without content, you panic."

Thinker, visionary — described by Time magazine as "perhaps Israel's paramount religious philosopher" — Rabbi Hartman feels he has a delicate balancing act: how to bolster Jewish identity in a world in which Jews are bombarded with Western, liberal, pluralistic and often, non-Jewish, values.

In fact, the topic Jewish Survival: Are We at Risk? is what Rabbi Hartman will address on April 18 at Toronto's Adath Israel Congregation (37 Southbourne Ave.) in the inaugural Sol Lederman Memorial Lecture, beginning at 8 p.m.

While Jews in the Diaspora are experiencing "a deeper sense of integration into the framework of their culture" — which poses its own danger — Jews in Israel are threatened by assimilation too, Rabbi Hartman told The CJN in a telephone interview last week.

Rabbi David Hartman

There are "very serious" Jewish identity problems in Israel, among them the mistaken belief that simply speaking Hebrew is a bulwark against outside forces, he says.

"You can speak Hebrew and never open a book by Maimonides," Rabbi Hartman said. "The mistake was to assume that the very serious problem of estrangement from tradition can't happen [in Israel]."

Another phenomenon that threatens to alienate many Israeli Jews is the muscle the Orthodox religious political parties flex in Israel and the restrictions their actions pose to everyday life, he says.

What Israelis seek, he says, is not freedom from religion, but "freedom from coercive powers. Should religious parties have spiritual power? When religious influences are legislated, that has a negative effect.

"[The religious parties] can ban an El Al plane from flying on Shabbat, but what does that El Al pilot think and do on Shabbat? The big question is, what's going to happen to 80 per cent of Israelis [who are not Orthodox]?"

The fervor of some religious groups in Israel is caused by much the same reasons as in the Diaspora, Rabbi Hartman believes: "The forces of intolerance are fed by fear of the secular world. In Israel, that's compounded."

And in the Diaspora, "the weakening of family spirituality and of foundational values, the mediating frameworks which touch Jews, the ghettoization of Jewish self-understanding ... these do not contribute to a healthy prognosis."

With that weakened sense of personal identity, "you'll be absorbed and not integrated."

What's needed, and soon, is for the powers-that-be to realize "that simply having a Jewish name or coming from a Jewish home is not sufficient."

The question is whether Jews "can develop conviction and joy of Jewish life, which would create a real sense of privilege in young people."

That commitment, he stresses, must have content; without content, it's meaningless.

The Shalom Hartman Institute, which is funded by the Israeli government, the Jewish Agency and private donations and is named for Rabbi Hartman's father, incorporates an Institute for Advanced Judaic Studies and several centres for thought on religious pluralism, Halachah and contemporary law and Jewish political thought.

Prior to immigrating to Israel in 1971 with his wife and five children, Rabbi Hartman served at Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem Synagogue in Cote St. Luc, a Montreal suburb.

His lecture will be presented by United Israel Appeal of Canada and the Shalom Hartman Institute. It is named in memory of Sol Lederman, who died last November. Lederman co-founded the institute and was president of both UIA Canada and the Canadian Friends of the Shalom Hartman Institute.

Winnipeg Jewish groups unite for Holocaust outreach program

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Corresondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Jewish Theatre and the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC)'s Holocaust Remembrance Committee are working together on an outreach program aimed at bringing the lessons of the Holocaust to as many Manitoba students as possible.

The Winnipeg Jewish Theatre's Education Outreach Program has invited 5,000 students from around the province to attend 15 special matinee performances of The Diary of Anne Frank, the season's second mainstage production running April 16 to May 1.

In conjunction with the Anne Frank showings, the Holocaust Remembrance Committee will send teacher Hersh Zentner along with a survivor and a young veteran of the March of the Living to interest schools.

"This opportunity to collaborate with the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre is beneficial to all of us," said Evelyn Hecht, the WJCC's director of community relations.

Twenty-one schools have signed up for the program, a number of them in rural areas.

The Holocaust Remembrance Committee's involvement in public education and outreach received a significant boost last fall when Barbara Goszer and Talmud Torah-I.L. Peretz School principal Edith Kimelman became co-chairs. Both survivors view outreach and educatiion as crucial to the committee's work.

"Our three-person teams provide first-person experience, history and a contemporary view," Hecht said. "From our observations, many students are overwhelmed by what they hear. Only later, when they see Anne Frank, will they be able to put the pieces together."

A March of the Living veteran will field audience questions after the play. As well, the theatre has invited Winnipeg high school students from six art programs to submit works reflecting the play's themes. The art will be displayed in the lobby during the show's run.

Baycrest kicks off its UJA campaign

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — "My kids have learned more about Jewish holidays in an Israeli nursery school than I learned in all my years of public school," Eddie Ben-Tzur, emissary of the United Israel Appeal to Canada, recently told a group of residents of the Baycrest Terrace on Ameer Avenue.

"Israel is the only place you don't have to make any special effort to be Jewish, because it's all around you," said the Boston-born Ben-Tzur, who made aliyah in 1977 and who brought his family here in July 1992 so he and his wife Ruth could take on their present duties. (Ruth Ben-Tzur is Israel's consul to Canada and the director of the Israel Government Tourist Office.)

Ben-Tzur condemned the recent brutal massacre by a Jewish fanatic of Palestinians praying in Hebron. "We can be proud of the way we've responded, from the prime minister to the head of the opposition to 95 per cent of the settlers in the territories and most Israelis," he said. The Israeli government was quick to voice shame, revulsion and condemnation, and to offer condolences to affected Palestinians, he observed.

Recalling recent atrocities against Jews, such as the 1985 slaughter of 23 Jews in a Turkish synagogue, he asked: Where was the Palestinian revulsion and condemnation? "When something like this happens, the usual Palestinian reaction is for four or five Palestinian groups to vie with each other to claim credit," he said.

Several days before the Hebron tragedy, several Israeli Jews were killed by Palestinian terrorists. "Where was the condemnation of the United Nations?" Ben-Tzur asked. "For Israelis and Jews around the world, acts of Jewish terrorism are shameful and must be condemned. But for many Palestinians, acts of terrorism are a matter of policy."

Ben-Tzur raised the issue of Israel-Diaspora unity, asking, "Is the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) slogan 'We Are One' merely a slogan devoid of all content?" Israeli Jews have felt abandoned by the Diaspora at times, he said, as when Scud missiles fired on Israel during the Gulf War prompted many Jewish families from North America to flee.

He asserted that Canadian Jews and Israeli Jews "are not two separate people, one living in Canada and one in Israel. We're one people who derive common benefit, one from the other." Now that Israel is on the road to peace, the Jewish nation needs the support of Jews in the Diaspora more than ever, Ben-Tzur said.

Referring to the Jews of Sarajevo, Ethiopia and other embattled localities who have benefited from UJA activities, Ben-Tzur said, "My message is that you must support Israel to help us save or assist Jewish people who are in life-threatening situations around the world."

Ben-Tzur encouraged his listeners to participate in a United Jewish Appeal fundraising event scheduled at the Terrace on April 8. Last year's UJA campaign at the Terrace involved donations from about 200 residents and raised about $11,000.

This month, the UJA publishes the first edition of The Golden Giver, a newsletter targeted at longtime supporters.

Hope for the tennis courts

TORONTO — There is hope on the horizon for the battered tennis courts at the north branch of the Jewish Community Centre on Bathurst Street.

The JCC is hoping to receive a capital grant from North York to completely rebuild the eight courts.

In a letter to members, Harold Cipin, director of operations, says it is hoped the grant will allow the rebuilding by the 1995 season. Only four courts are playable at the present time and they are also in need of some repairs.

For the 1994 season, Cipin says the JCC cannot offer any repairs, but will provide supervision and a court reservation system. The fee will be $50 for those who pay prior to May 1 and $75 after that. The fee last year was $75.

Weizmann Women for Science set to honor Marvelle Koffler

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Weizmann Women for Science will be honoring Marvelle Koffler at a black-tie tribute dinner to be held May 30 at the Sheraton Centre.

Koffler, the founder of International Weizmann Women for Science, is "a person who inspires people," said Carol Gordon, dinner co-chair and Weizmann Women (Toronto) co-chair. "She is very unassuming and really brings out the best in people."

At Koffler's suggestion, the first meeting of Weizmann Women for Science was held in Israel in 1988. The group was the result of Koffler's "love of the institute and feeling that women should play a greater role in their contribution to the institute," Gordon said.

Koffler's husband, Murray, founded the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science in 1965. The Rehovot institute is a world renowned university and scientific research centre.

In the past six years, Weizmann Women for Science groups have been formed in cities around the world including Buenos Aires, London, Los Angeles, Mexico City, Miami, Milan, Montevideo, Montreal, New York, Paris and Toronto.

The Toronto group's original mandate was to educate women about science, Gordon said. The group, which met for the first time at Koffler's home in 1989, now does all the programming for the Toronto chapter.

Marvelle Koffler

The dinner marks the first fundraiser spearheaded by Weizmann Women in Toronto. "It was our decision to move from educating people about science to financially supporting science," said Gordon.

The dinner will mark the establishment of the International Weizmann Women for Science Research Fund to underwrite medical research at the Weizmann Institute in Rehovot. The fund will be focused on women's health issues such as cancer, arthritis, heart disease, osteoporosis and reproductive disorders.

A performance by award-winning pianist/flutist Naida Cole, 19, will follow the dinner. Cole is a Torontonian now studying at Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore.

As a highlight, Cole will perform an original composition by Ben Steinberg, director of music at Temple Sinai. The piece was commissioned for the evening as a tribute to Koffler.

The evening is planned as a threefold tribute, Gordon explained: to honor the Weizmann Institute itself, and the role of women in science as well as the honoree.

Raylene Godel and Jill Kaplun are co-chairing the dinner along with Gordon. Rose Wolfe, University of Toronto chancellor, is honorary dinner chair.

A committee of excellence, consisting of members of the scientific and academic community who wish to show their support of the institute, is being co-chaired by Robert Prichard, president of the University of Toronto, and Florence Haseltine, president of the Society for the Advancement of Women's Health Research in Washington, D.C.

An International Weizmann Women for Science honor committee is being chaired by Miriam Kerzner and Elaine James.

Respected philanthropist Rotman dies at age 84

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sam Rotman, a well-respected and popular Toronto businessman and philanthropist, died on the first Sunday of Pesach. He was 84.

Rotman was born in 1909 in Rachav, Poland. His father, who came to Canada earlier, brought him here in 1922. Sam Rotman worked with his father in a cap store, where he sold caps to vaudeville actors and stars from the Imperial and Victory theatres.

When his father was killed in a car accident, the still-young Sam Rotman supported the family.

His Rotman's Mens Wear store was a landmark in the Toronto Jewish community, first at Spadina and Dundas and later on Spadina at St. Andrews. He operated the store until 1945, when he turned it over to his sister and brother-in-law, Elsie and Mendel Goldstein, who ran it until just a few years ago.

Shortly after the war, Rotman went into the building and contracting business. He was responsible for stores, apartments and houses, including many businesses on Eglinton near Bathurst St.

Grandson Randy Daiter recalls walking along Eglinton with Rotman. "The merchants all spoke of him so highly — he was called 'the king of Eglinton.' "

His son Ronald, says that he was anxious to spread his good fortune around, and frequently brought other people into his business ventures, so that they might prosper too.

He loved Jewish learning, and for many years studied every day with Rabbi Joseph Kelman of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation.

A very religious man, he was a founder of Beth Sholom Synagogue, and over the years had connections with Hebrew Men of England Congregation, which later amalgamated with Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, and with Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill.

He donated a Torah scroll to Kehilat Shaare Torah Congregation, which was dedicated in April, 1991.

Sam Rotman being presented with the Heritage Award of Yeshiva University's Stern College in 1989.

National Fund, Technion, Boys Town Jerusalem, and Shaare Zedek Hospital.

His children speak of him as a person devoted to his family, who loved people and did many kindnesses. They remember him running out to put a nickel in a parking meter outside his store to save a total stranger from getting a ticket.

While he received many honors during his life, he did not seek the limelight, believing, they agreed, that "only through giving from one's heart can one receive."

Rotman was predeceased by his wives Celia and Mollie, brother Ralph, and sisters Marmel Sugar, Rose Rosenblatt and Chanele Grafstein. He is survived by son Ronald, daughters Lorraine Herlick, and Marcia Daiter, sister Elsie Goldstein, eight grandchildren and five great grandchildren.

Charity an important obligation

He felt charity was an important obligation, and he gave generously. Some of his beneficiaries in Toronto were Baycrest Hospital, Senior Care, where the Sam Rotman Humanitarian Award was established in honor of his 80th birthday, Mount Sinai Hospital, Ner Israel Yeshiva, and She'arim, Eitz Chaim, Bialik, and Associated Hebrew day schools.

In 1989, he received the Heritage Award for his work for Stern College of Yeshiva University in New York.

In Israel, he was involved with Bar-Ilan University, Israel Bonds, Israel Gesher Foundation, Histadrut, Jewish

Jewish lesbians discuss life in alternative families

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Simone Mayer was worried she would be pushing some buttons by announcing to her family that she, a lesbian, and her friend, a gay man, were choosing to have a baby together.

"[But] to tell the truth, I've never gotten so much acceptance in my life," said the 32-year-old day-care worker.

Mayer said her parents are thrilled that Laurie, the father of her now 4-month-old son, is Jewish; but, her live-in relationship with him also means they never have to invite her lover to visit. This saddens Mayer and, she says, makes it harder for her to be a lesbian.

Speaking at a recent women's panel on alternative families presented by the Morris Winchevsky School Community and the United Jewish People's Order, Mayer said she came out as a lesbian at 22. Laurie told her he was gay when they were both 18 and attending a Jewish high school.

The two talked on and off for years about having a child. When she turned 30 she began to think seriously about getting pregnant. "Laurie and I bought a house, so we could see how living with each other would be before we brought a baby into this world." A year and a half later she was pregnant with their son Ben.

Mayer attended a day school, went to Zionist camps, visited Israel six times and lived there for a year. She has also taught Hebrew to preschoolers at the downtown Jewish Community Centre and for the past few months she has been taking Yiddish lessons.

"I identify myself as a Jewish lesbian. Both those adjectives are pretty much apparent about me within the first five minutes of meeting me. They were never anything I was embarrassed about, but rather I have always felt strong about who I am."

Until a year and a half ago Mayer attended the Conservative synagogue of her childhood for holidays, but she said a bar mitzvah speech the rabbi made concerning "the threat of homosexuality in the Jewish community" smacked of rejection to her.

"I never thought that the form of Judaism I was so familiar with would reject me. I never thought that I, a woman who identifies with Jewish culture, would feel threatened in a synagogue."

Panelist Lois Fine, a writer and a founder of the Jewish Women's Committee to End the Occupation of the West Bank and Gaza, said she and her partner Rachel have two children.

"Both Rachel's and my biological families are supportive of us as lesbian mothers," she said, "but it hurts me that my mother has never called either of my kids her grandchildren."

Panelist Wendy Gross, a lawyer, said hundreds of provincial and federal laws confer legal status on heterosexual families. Hospitals cannot keep a heterosexual partner from visiting their loved one in the intensive care unit; a heterosexual person is never at risk under family law of losing custody of the children because of their sexual orientation; and if a heterosexual person has paid into a pension plan and dies, the pension laws say the surviving partner is entitled to survivor's benefits, she said.

"Not one of these laws can be used to protect a person's rights if he or she is not heterosexual."

She said the Ontario attorney general has promised to introduce a bill in the legislature this spring granting rights and responsibilities to gay and lesbian families. "The NDP have promised to expand the definition of spouse from the perspective that the exclusion of gays and lesbians is a human rights issue. It's not about special privileges, special interests, it's about basic human rights."

Jewish families examined

TORONTO — Jewish families can be characterized as either "brick-wall" or "backbone," according to one of North America's most prolific lecturers on child rearing.

Behind Barbara Coloroso's unusual terminology is one unmistakable message: Jewish families are generally strong.

Coloroso will be speaking in Toronto, April 11, at a lecture sponsored by United Jewish Appeal Women's Campaign, UJA Business and Professional Women's Network, Jewish Women's Federation and the Board of Jewish Education.

One of North America's most respected parenting experts, Coloroso has separated families into three categories — "brick wall," "jellyfish," and "backbone."

In her upcoming book Kids are Worth It, Coloroso defined a brick-wall parent as one with "absolute authority," who enforces orders and "always wins." Jellyfish families are marked by anarchy and chaos without "recognizable structure, rules and guidelines." Backbone parents "don't demand respect, they demonstrate and teach it."

Coloroso claims to have researched the attitudes of 10 major religions toward children. Her finding? "They all treat kids with dignity."

Her book is filled with philosophical snippets from a number of religious writers including noted rabbi and psychiatrist Abraham Twerski.

Coloroso is a mother of three from Colorado, who lectured last year to more than a quarter of a million people.

She believes children should be given six messages. "I believe in you. I trust you. I know you can handle life situations. You are listened to. You are cared for. You are very important to me."

Tickets for her Toronto presentation at Adath Israel Congregation, 37 Southbourne Ave., are $15 in advance and $20 at the door. For futher information, call Glenda at 635-2883, ext. 600.

Winnipeg community to honor one of Canada's leading Yiddishists

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — On May 30, the Winnipeg Jewish Community is having a testimonial concert in honor of its oldest active member, Noach Witman.

The concert, to be held at the Pantages Theatre, will be emceed by Alan Blye and feature Herschel and Judy Fox from Los Angeles, Finjan, the Chai Folk Ensemble and a mass Yiddish choir led by Aviva Katz.

Broadcaster, editor, journalist and one of western Canada's leading Yiddishists, Witman turns 90 on April 15 and is showing no signs of slowing down. Born in Poland, Witman has been a lifelong Labor Zionist. His Zionist activity cut short his university studies in electrical engineering in Kiev.

"We were fighting the Jewish Communists and breaking up their meetings," he recalled. "They were all killed in the 1930s by Stalin."

Three times arrested for his work on behalf of the Chalutz movement, he was finally given a choice of Siberia or America by a sympathetic Jewish attorney-geneal in Kiev.

He chose Winnipeg where he had a married older sister. With some difficulty and a six-month delay in Latvia, he was finally able to come in 1927. Although he wanted to go to Palestine, he had to go to work to help bring the rest of his family out of Poland.

Witman's first job in Canada was as a teacher for a Jewish storekeeper's family in Altona, south of Winnipeg. However, he also quickly threw himself into community work. He was active in a host of communal organizations including Canadian Jewish Congress, the Labor Zionist Movement and Histadrut. In the 1940s and '50s, he travelled throughout western Canada for Histadrut as its western Canadian executive director, giving speeches and raising money in the small Jewish communities and, along with his first wife, Sarah, often providing the entertainment, too.

In the mid-1950s, he became the publisher and later editor of The Israelite Press, a position he held until 1967. He also began his radio career with a weekly hour-long Yiddish language radio airing for the first time Feb. 7, 1954. In 1972, he branched into television with a regular Yiddish program on the local public-access cable network.

Although Witman did not get to Palestine as he intended almost 70 years ago, he has more than made up for it. Through Histadrut and his own Travel Agent which he operated in the 1970s and '80s, he has been to Israel almost 40 times and still leads yearly group tours.

At 90, Witman is still going strong. In addition to his regular radio and television programs, he writes a weekly Yiddish language column in The Jewish Post and News and serves as executive secretary of Winnipeg's Committee for Yiddish and executive director of the Histradrut Amal campaign in Winnipeg. He also never turns down an opportunity to entertain with his original songs, poems and humor.

There are times, he says, when he finds it hard to get out of bed but once up and about, he rarely feels his age.

Witman is also to receive the Honorable Sam Filer Distinguished Service Award at the Canadian Jewish Congress 75th anniversary reception April 17, as part of the seventh National Jewish Educational Conference to be held in Winnipeg April 16-18.

Montreal Gazette says no to ads from messianic group

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Gazette has notified a messianic group seeking to make inroads with the Jewish community that it will no longer publish its ads unless its events are "clearly indicated" as "Christian."

But one of the group's leaders vowed to fight the move, calling it arbitrary and saying the newspaper failed to get his group's side of the story before making the decision.

The newspaper's advertising sales supervisor, Michael Parker, notified the Kehilat She'ar Yashuv Messianic Congregation — a group operating out of the Salvation Army depot of Dollard des Ormeaux since last summer — after receiving a complaint from B'nai Brith League for Human Rights officials.

The March 5 ad, under the heading "Messianic Congregation" and featuring a menorah, Star of David and fish symbols, invited the public to "come and share a Passover seder with us" on March 27, the evening of the second ritual meal.

The group had been advertising for about a year in the Gazette's Saturday edition, and in a French-language newspaper, La Presse.

The decision by the newspaper appeared to mark the first measurable progress on the part of the Jewish community to require the messianic group to identify itself as Christian, despite its persistent claim it is "Jewish."

Messianic leader Percy Johnson, however, said his group will "not accept" the decision by the Gazette and will consider seeking legal advice.

"We are not Christians, and we do not consider ourselves Christians," Johnson said.

Johnson said he was out of town for two weeks when the Gazette supposedly "notified" him.

"How can the Gazette accept an argument without knowing who we are," he said. "That's what I don't understand. It's like being declared guilty without going to the jury."

Officials from Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) and the Orthodox Beth Tikvah Synagogue adjacent to the Salvation Army depot have tried for months to persuade messianic group officials to desist from making overtures to residents of the predominantly-Jewish neighborhood, but with no apparent success.

However, CJC-Q, synagogue and messianic group officials have been meeting in an attempt to reach a compromise. CJC-Q executive director Michael Crelinsten said his organization hopes to revive discussions with Salvation Army officials, which had lapsed when no progress was made over the question of the Army allowing the messianic group to conduct services on its premises.

In a letter sent to the Gazette by Quebec chair Allan Adel, the League stressed that it did not object to "any religious group holding worship services, or advertising them.

"Our sole concern is with publication of an advertisement containing false or misleading statements or representations.

"In this instance the ad contains nothing that would advise the unwary that this is a Christian rather than a Jewish sponsored seder."

In a statement issued by the League nine days later, national chair Stephen Scheinberg described members of the messianic group as "Christian missionaries."

In the same statement, Adel commended the Gazette "for its responsiveness to our concerns.

"It demonstrates a commitment to accuracy and integrity in advertising and to fairness to inter-group relations."

Johnson, however, strongly disagrees that the ad is misleading.

Rabbi Lamm to talk on Jewish care

TORONTO — Palliative Care Week will be marked by the Jewish Hospice Program with a lecture by Rabbi Maurice Lamm.

Rabbi Lamm, the author of the classic work The Jewish Way in Death and Mourning, is president of the National Institute for Jewish Hospice in the United States.

The lecture, entitled To Heal and to Hope: Strategies of Jewish Care, will be held at the Wagman Centre Main Floor, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, 55 Ameer Ave., on April 27. A reception and book display will be held from 5:30 to 6:30 p.m., and the lecture will be from 6:30 to 8 p.m.

Admission is free, but seating is limited.

The Jewish Hospice Program (JHP) began in the summer of 1993. Since then, it has been actively assisting the terminally ill. While its initial goal was to serve 30 families in its first year of operation, in the first eight months it has received 45 referrals.

The JHP stresses home assistance for the dying patient as well as for the caregivers, in keeping with the philosophy of maintaining the dignity and comfort of the terminally ill and their families.

To reserve for the lecture, call (416)635-2900, ext. 473. For more information about the JHP, call Renee Montpellier at (416)635-2860, ext. 419.

Married in secret, Rosenthals celebrate 50 years

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Two days before Passover, on April 5, 1944, Miriam Schwarcz and William Rosenthal were married in Hungary in a secret wedding ceremony.

Now, 50 years later, the Rosenthals rejoice at their miraculous survival and the blessings of having three children. Their oldest son was born in a concentration camp, one of only seven children ever born in Kaufering camp. The Rosenthals have seven grandchildren.

Interviewed in their shop, Miriam's Fine Judaica at 3007 Bathurst St., Miriam tells a tale of strength and survival.

Miriam was born in 1924 into a wealthy Orthodox family in Komarno, Czechoslovakia, the youngest of five girls in a family of 13 children.

Most Jews in Czechoslovakia disbelieved the reports of the anti-Jewish laws and regulations brought to them by escaping Polish Jews. They said it could never happen in Czechoslovakia. Her sister Ella and husband Joseph Fleischmann were the only family members to leave the country, moving to Canada with their two small children to work as farmers.

Until March of 1944, life in Komarno was relatively calm. Then the Hungarian occupiers put into motion the Final Solution. They entered the synagogue and took the rabbi away. The remaining men were taken to labor camps. The Schwarcz women and Miriam's baby brother fled to their isolated farm.

Miriam had just become engaged to William, who lived in Miskolc, Hungary. The wedding date had been set, the trousseau was ready and the invitations had been ordered. But Jews were not allowed to travel. A non-Jewish friend of William's risked his life to ferry Miriam to Miskolc. She was disguised as the man's daughter, with false papers and wearing a cross. She was 20.

The Germans had beaten her to Miskolc. Nevertheless, said the rabbi, "you came and you are engaged. We have to make a wedding. It will be tonight." The next day the bombing began.

William was taken to a forced labor camp and for about three months, by bribing the guards, the honeymooners saw each other occasionally. The Jews of Miskolc were moved to the ghetto, a brick factory.

In early June, 1944, those remaining in the ghetto were transported to Auschwitz in cattle cars. Miriam recalled the degradation — shaved, numbered and moved from place to place. It was in Plaszow, near Krakow, that she became aware of the "kicking and moving inside me."

Sent back to Auschwitz, Miriam knew she had to keep her pregnancy secret: women there were tempted with double food portions to reveal their pregnancy and then whisked away to the gas chambers. Instead, Miriam was sent to Augsburg, Germany to work in a Messerschmidt factory.

The Americans were stepping up their bombing. She was seven months pregnant and enroute back to Auschwitz when the SS escort learned the camp had been bombed. Miriam was sent instead to Kaufering camp, where she joined six other pregnant Hungarian women.

The seven became known as the Schwanger Kommando (pregnant commando) and were assigned to laundry duty. Dr. Vadasz, a skeleton of a gynecologist, delivered their babies with a tallis wrapped around him as an apron and without instruments, medication or sterilization. Miriam said the Germans knew the war was ending and wanted to show the world they didn't kill infants.

"That is why they left us alone."

On Purim, Miriam's 10-pound baby boy, Leslie, was born after 48 hours of intensive labor. Through the kindness of Polish Jews and a few Germans, she survived. Soon after, everyone was liberated by the Americans on April 30, 1945.

Shoeless and emaciated, Miriam found her way back to Komarno and sent a message to Miskolc that she was alive. William couldn't believe it. When they reunited, he was even more astonished. He never knew she was pregnant and that they had a son.

Leaving behind only remnants of their families, the three Rosenthals left for Canada in June 1947.

They worked in factories in Toronto, William stuffing mattresses and Miriam picking up the runs in nylon stockings, before moving to Sudbury. The Rosenthals have two other children, Lillian and Murray.

"I believe I survived the ordeals of the war because of my deep faith in G-d and because of the piety and dedication to tzedakah of my parents," Miriam said.

Miriam Schwartz covers the yellow star on her arm at her secret wedding to William Rosenthal in Hungary on April 5, 1944.

This was a special Passover for the Rosenthals. Half a century ago their lives together began and almost came to an abrupt end. Despite the horrendous memories, this is indeed a golden anniversary for the Rosenthals.

Israeli hockey team wins one tournament game

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The pain in Spain was mainly in the game.

Game 1, that is, of Israel's recent attempt to better its record in international hockey competition.

With memories of last year's disappointing 0-5 showing in Bled, Slovenia, on their minds, the boys in blue and white were optimistic that they could bounce back to the arena of respectability with a strong showing at the International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF)'s C-2 Division competition in Barcelona recently.

And judging by the competitiveness of the games, they did so, despite a slow start in Game 1. That matchup was, by all accounts, a blowout as the host Spaniards, perhaps buoyed by the lavish opening ceremonies and with Israel playing its third-string goalie, throttled their opponents by a score of 17-2.

The Israelis fought back gamely and were in every game afterwards. Unfortunately, they managed only one win to go along with four losses, leaving them disappointed and wishing they had more time to prepare.

Going into the tournament, team organizers were hoping that last year's disappointing showing would serve as a wake-up call and induce their players to show up in shape. And while they did so, a week-long training camp in the Pyrenees principality of Andorra was not enough to get them ready for the rigors ahead.

After putting Game 1 behind them, Israel faced Australia next, jumping into a 3-1 first period lead. The Aussies tied the game with two powerplay tallies in the second but Israel took the lead in the third and held it until the final 10 minutes. That's when the boys from Down Under squeezed out a couple of late goals and held off a furious attack by the Israelis, who pulled their goalie. Despite intense pressure, they just couldn't tie it up. Defenceman Ido Lee was named star of the game for Israel.

Game 3 saw Israel face off against Croatia. Yevgeny Gusin, who practised with teams in the East Coast and Colonial Hockey Leagues, was between the pipes.

Israel played the Croats tough but early in the second the Croats broke through the Israeli defence and scored a powerplay marker. With the Israelis reeling, they popped in another only 18 seconds later. That was the proverbial ball game.

"We couldn't capitalize on our chances," said centre Uzi Lee, who had three goals and one assist in the tourney. "It was a 0-0 game except for one minute. The rest of the time, we played strong."

The final was 2-0 with Gusin being named star of the game for Israel.

Game 4 saw the Israelis face off against Belgium, which had dominated them at last year's tournament. The Belgians, bolstered by several players who play semi-pro in Holland, led 3-1 after two periods but early in the third, Israel narrowed the gap to 3-2. Defenceman Oded Orgil said Israel pressed but failed to score the next goal. Belgium did. On the powerplay. They later added an empty-netter to settle the matter, 5-2. Gusin was again the star for Israel.

Game 5 was a different story. Facing South Africa and with Boris Amronim in net, Israel pounced all over their opponents. Uzi Lee scored a hat trick, sabra skater Ran Oz got a goal as did Russian-born Oleg Sobolev and Israel cruised to a 7-2 win.

Lee said the team improved from game to game but came up just short on a number of occasions. "It's just a shame because for three games, the performance was just shy."

"We're disappointed," Orgil said. "A couple of games could have gone either way. The Australia game really hurt because we could have beaten them. It was there for the taking."

Lee said this year's version of the Israeli nationals was the best yet and Orgil pointed out Israel reversed a result of two years ago when South Africa beat Israel 5-1.

Good showing

Orgil agreed that the team had improved since last year but it remains handicapped by the absence of a full-size rink in Israel on which to practise as well as the lack of preparation time in advance of the tournament. "It's tough to put together a team in just six days," he said.

"We had a very good showing," said Toronto-based coach Gideon Lee. "We had an excellent camp, but it was not enough." Lee said the team "finally jelled" towards the end of the tournament.

Assistant coach Marshall Uretsky, also of Toronto, agreed the team was improved from last year. "We were extremely competitive and could've been 4-1 instead of 1-4," he said. "With a break here or there, we could have won the last four games."

Israel's most valuable players, as selected by Gideon Lee, were Gusin in goal, defenceman Jacques Didie Rusinek and forward Evgeni Feldman.

Feldman led Israeli scorers with four goals and one assist in five games while Gusin had a 3.67 goals against average in three games. Rusinek scored two goals in five games and was plus five to lead the team in that category.

Toronto-born Mike Rubin served as team captain. Other skaters with a Canadian connection included Orgil, the Lee brothers and Rusinek, who learned the game in Toronto, Ward Parson, who hails from British Columbia and Michael Blumberg of Winnipeg.

The team's general manager was Paul Shindman while Howie Simon, whose brother Todd is a Buffalo Sabre prospect, was assistant to the coaches. Both hail from Toronto. Barry Goldberg of Oakville, Ont. was team physiotherapist.

A marriage a month for Singles Registry

Since its inception at the Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue in Montreal over eight years ago, and in Toronto, a little over a year ago, The Jewish Singles Registry is now beaming from its many marriages.

"We average a wedding a month," says Dora Korzinstone, the registry's founder. "Our reputation has now grown throughout Canada as being one of the easiest, most non-threatening and fun ways for Jewish singles to meet."

The Registry network now consists of 3 cities: Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa, with inquiries coming in from Calgary and as far away as Vancouver.

"The system works!" says Sandy Danovitch, director of the Montreal office. "Our members select for themselves who they would like to go out with. We provide them with biographies and profiles to read, as well as photographs to view, but it is the member in the end who ultimately makes the selection who to go out with. No astrology, no psychic intuition, No Blind Dates."

The Toronto office is the Registry's biggest success story to date. Close to 400 members have registered in just over a year's time. The Registry reports it already has its first engagement, with two more on the horizon in the very near future.

"Business is booming," says Rob Singer, director in Toronto. "Torontonians are now realizing that if you are single, the Registry is the place to be. A lot of our new members are referrals from friends who are with the service, a definite sign that people are very happy with what the Jewish Singles Registry has to offer."

Membership in the Registry is open to Jewish singles aged 20 and up. The service is strictly confidential and both parties must agree before any phone numbers are disclosed.

Whether you are just looking to expand your current group of friends, get involved in a serious relationship, or ready to get married, the Jewish Singles Registry is an introduction service like no other. It is honest, straightforward and affordable. With no unwelcome surprises. Best of all, because you do the choosing — no date is a blind date.

For more information about the Jewish Singles Registry please call: in Montreal — (514) 937-2049; in Toronto — (416) 398-7068; in Ottawa — (613) 592-9797.

Just Bathrooms handles renovations like pros

A bathroom renovation can be a major factor in adding to the value of your home and the quality of your life because you use your bathroom every day.

If your renovation is handled by bathroom specialists Derek, Rick or Michael LaMarche of Just Bathrooms, you deal with people who deliver quality craftmanship and service.

The LaMarche brothers have renovated more than 1,900 bathrooms in Toronto, and they firmly believe that keeping customers in the picture throughout, and doing the work properly, on schedule and with minimum disruption, are company cornerstones for success.

"We give our clients total service all the way," says Derek. "We go to the home and provide a free estimate. If this is satisfactory we take them out shopping for materials and fixtures to help co-ordinate everything. For instance, the white of a tub in most cases won't match the white of tiles unless you're very careful. This way it all turns out exactly as the customer desires.

"Some companies show you material only from their showroom, which limits the customer's choice. Some contractors show only inferior material to lower the price. At Just Bathrooms we'll show and select the best products from the nicer displays at Taps, Ginger's, American Standard, Centura and Ramca. We buy these high-quality products from whichever of these fine companies gives us the best price.

"We then install this quality material with quality labor. That way your new bathroom will last forever.

"Just Bathrooms has two strict rules," he continues. "We don't start a job until all materials are on hand and once started we're there every day until it's finished.

"We put down drop sheets [and] install a temporary shower and toilet facilities. Usually we can finish everything in two weeks and then there's a final inspection by the homeowner before paying the agreed amount."

Just Bathrooms is pleased to provide neighborhood references, which include nine pages of names and phone numbers of their previous customers. Just Bathrooms is always happy to show some of the beautiful bathrooms they have created for their clientele.

All work and materials are fully guaranteed for 12 years (some conditions apply).

For further information, call Just Bathrooms at (416) 322-3535 24 hours.

Taschen! – Anything else is just a bag

A quick review of the exciting new Taschen! line of leather handbags, luggage and accessories suggests that the above statement is more than mere advertising hype.

In their twelve-year association with the fine leather goods firm of Bree, Bruno Mathes and his wife Signe developed an expertise and taste for the best in this field. They also made a discovery.

It seemed obvious to them that there were basically just two kinds of fine leather bags being offered for sale outside Europe.

One kind was classically beautiful in materials and construction, but (they thought) too staid in its approach to design. The other expressed the fashion trends of the moment, but often seemed to lack the timeless elegance which they felt fine leather, however fashionable, demanded.

Between the two, they didn't see much. Except a gap ... and an opportunity.

So just five months ago, Bruno and Signe Mathes took a deep breath ... and jumped right into that gap.

Co-operating closely with longtime European associate Klaus Bree and with Japanese teammate Hidemi Saito, the Matheses have sourced the best of the best suppliers and designers in both Europe and Asia to bring their vision excitingly to life in ways that meet the tastes and lifestyles of both Occidental and Oriental markets.

Stores in Yorkville (Toronto) and Ogilvy (Montréal)

The result is Taschen! – a new collection of leather bags, luggage and related accessories now available through Taschen's own retail outlets in Toronto (at 156 Yorkville Avenue in Yorkville), Montreal (in Ogilvy), Calgary, and Vancouver, and through other carefully chosen retailers throughout North America. And soon, through Taschen! franchises, in Beverly Hills, Jakarta and Singapore.

Taschen! provides a variety that will delight both the classicists, to whom leather is almost a sacred icon, and the fashionable, whose style-sense demands to be satisfied. There's a range of price-points, too: the Matheses do not believe you should have to be rich to revel in the joys of fine leather.

And ... filling any gap between fashion and function ... there is an intriguing variety of stylistic approaches, the result of the firm's decision to use several designers, not just one; and to give each permission to stretch the limits of his or her distinctive design sense.

There are certain design parameters, however: no fussiness, no faddiness, and no useless ornamentation. Shapes are sleek and simple, with no meaningless decoration: stitching, for example, is where it belongs, not romping around embellishing surfaces to no purpose.

Zippers and fastenings are placed right where your hand expects to find them. Straps are comfortable, handles pleasant to the grasp.

It's a perfect marriage of flair and function at a price range that puts beautiful and stylish leather into the hands of almost anyone who loves it.

Finest materials

Working with the best materials doesn't hurt the cause. The leathers used in the Taschen! line come from German and Italian sources that are the gold standard for fine leathers. Natural tones are in abundance; colour is artfully used as well.

Fabrics – hefty natural linens for casual pieces and, for luggage, ballistic nylon that could almost stop a bullet – are similarly sourced. Linings are chosen with an eye to aesthetics and durability.

Hardware is exquisite: solid, elemental, burnished to a discreet shine; placed and sized right for ease of opening and closing.

All materials are finished to enhance, not overpower, their natural qualities.

All in all, it's a fresh and wider vision of what a leather collection should offer to its customers.

TASCHEN!
UNTIL YOU'VE
IT'S ONLY

School blends old with new

Rachel Phillips Belash has some impressive credentials: a Ph.D. in Latin American Studies, past teaching positions at Dartmouth and Vassar Colleges, former head of a prestigious girls' boarding school in Connecticut, founder of the Coalition of Girls' Boarding Schools, and vice-president at the Bank of Boston.

She is now principal of Branksome Hall. What prompted this move to Toronto?

Belash, now seven months into her new job, says she was tempted by this position because Toronto still supports a number of good, single-sex schools. Belash's experience of co-ed education has made her acutely aware of the disadvantages of this system for girls; the vigor of the single-sex schools in Toronto appealed to her.

Branksome itself appealed to Belash for a number of distinctive reasons. First was its location in downtown Toronto, divided as it is by a major thoroughfare (Mount Pleasant Road), and housed largely in old Victorian mansions. These physical elements make the school what it uniquely is.

These charming houses give Branksome the feeling of warmth and welcome for which it is renowned. The human-scale buildings create a homey feeling which is embodied in the warm, friendly relationships that exist between students and faculty. Yet a school also needs up-to-date facilities. So, next to the elegant mansions are the new gymnasium, impressive science wing and Junior School. The overwhelming sense of community at Branksome is evidence that the school has successfully blended old with new and united its 11 buildings into one.

Belash was also impressed by Branksome's strength in science and math, debating and athletics — all areas which are traditionally less strong in an all-girls' school, yet which build confidence and prepare young women to thrive in what is still a man's world.

Branksome graduates are a tribute to its academic excellence and challenging yet supportive environment. Mary Alice Stuart, a recipient of the Order of Canada, is Chair and CEO of CJRT-FM Inc.; Shirley Brown is a partner at a distinguished law firm; Dr. Marg Lawson specializes in pediatric endocrinology. The list goes on.

Belash's first impression of Branksome was that the school is a connected place with a sense of its own identity. As principal, she now faces the challenge of guiding that identity towards the next century.

Hadassah-WIZO gives teens a second chance

Every Child Deserves a Future is more than a slogan Toronto Hadassah-WIZO is using to promote its 1994 Youth Aliyah drive, a spokeswoman says.

It's a heartfelt pledge to nurture a Jewish identity in youths who might otherwise be lost both phyically and spiritually, Youth Aliyah chair Mindy Kirsh says. Toronto Hadassah-WIZO will focus on rescuing thousands of youth from the former Soviet Union and placing them in one of the organization's many Israeli facilities.

"This campaign is what Israel and Zionism are all about — providing a home for Jews who need one."

And more than 300,000 have needed one since Youth Aliyah was founded in 1933 to save children fleeing from persecution in Nazi Germany.

Children like 13-year-old Katya, whom members of Toronto Hadassah-WIZO's delegation met in Israel. Her Soviet parents were given the choice of keeping her in a dangerous, uncertain atmosphere or sending her to Israel, where she could embrace and enjoy her Jewish heritage without fear of reprisals. An easy choice, perhaps, but it took Katya a few months to adjust to Israeli life.

Or Elimelech. One of four children, the Grade 10 student's home environment was compelling. Financial problems were crippling and his parents were divorcing under hostile conditions. Removed from this unhealthy atmosphere, Elimelech, like Katya, has blossomed.

These are human dramas with one theme. Jewish children, who need others to save, rehabilitate and educate them.

Toronto Hadassah-WIZO is committed to giving teens such as Katya and Elimelech the chance to become valued and productive citizens of Israel, Kirsh says. Many who donate to this worthwhile cause through Hadassah-WIZO are not even members of the organization; they are simply people who care about Jewish youth.

These friends of Youth Aliyah and Hadassah-WIZO members always eagerly anticipate the annual fund-raising luncheon, which this year will be held on May 29.

Keynote speaker is best-selling author Judith Viorst, well-known for her humorous insights into life's experiences.

Every man's closet deserves at least one Stavros suit

Your closet may not contain the riches of kings, but it should hold at least one Stavros suit to make you look and feel like royalty.

For a wedding, bar mitzvah or other special occasion – or for that important business meeting – the quality and finish that only a master tailor like Stavros can provide will help you make the appropriate statement.

Creating fine suits is nothing new for Stavros; he's been doing it for 25 years. During that time, well-dressed men from Toronto (and around the world) have flocked to his shop for the Stavros treatment. Each suit is painstakingly hand-crafted from the finest materials available. Leading European mills like Zegna, Wain Sheill, Holland and Sherry, Scabal, Dormeuil, and others are constantly sourced for the latest fabrics.

Stavros' attention to detail is legendary; hand stitching abounds. If you're a perfectionist, Stavros will go you one better, insisting on repeat fittings as needed to achieve the ideal fit.

Busy professionals can also enjoy his custom fittings in the privacy of their home or office, and complete wardrobe consultation is offered at no charge.

Stavros offers something else that other tailors don't: a five-year warranty on every suit he sells. He'll also have your suit hand cleaned and hand pressed for free twice a year for the first three years you own it.

Located in spanking new quarters at 95 Cumberland Street, Stavros also offers a fabulous selection of fine shirts and ties. (Shirts are available ready-t-wear or custom-made).

For a limited time only, Stavros is offering special savings on suits and shirts made to measure from in-store fabric. Order a suit, and you'll enjoy a savings of 50% off book prices; order three shirts, and you'll receive a fourth absolutely free. It's a rare opportunity to wear the best at unheard-of prices.

Unique's Spring Fling Offers Serious Savings on Casual Wear

Levi's Boutique introduced

As springtime (finally!) shows its face, the staff at The Unique Stockroom is gearing up to ensure that your fling with spring is a fun affair. You'll find the STOCKPILE at UNIQUE much more picturesque (and wearable!) than the snowpiles of winter.

In response to growing demand, UNIQUE has opened a standalone LEVI'S boutique in the store, well-stocked with a full range of your favourite LEVI'S items for men and women. You'll find jeans (Stone 501's from $43, ladies' 501's in assorted colours from $39.98); jean jackets from $50; tops; sweat tops; belts from $17.98; even socks from $2.75. If it's LEVI'S, the Stockroom has it, in a full range of colours and sizes, at the UNIQUE prices you know and love.

Guys will MEXX out with a fabulous selection of T-shirts, polos, vests, and linen shirts, all UNIQUE-ly priced. Ladies will get in the ESPRIT of things with shorts, tank tops, blouses, and casual pants galore. The denim shorts in assorted colours are hot at only $21.98, as are the cotton tops from $14.98.

Both men and women will enjoy fabulous savings on GUESS jeans, as well as the usual miraculously low-priced UNIQUE tanks and tops ("Derek's Choice") at only $5 and $6 respectively. Available in a rainbow of fashion colours, these UNIQUE tops wash and wear like iron and outshine other brands costing double and more!

Aside from the clothing, you'll find UNIQUE a fun place to shop, with an easygoing staff that's never pushy. You'll never lose your shirt there, or your shorts . . . but that doesn't stop them from offering you fabulous values on both. Try PRESIDENT STONE boxer shorts for ladies, DEX boxer shorts for men.

There's always something UNIQUE going on at UNIQUE, like a box of jellybeans at the door. Guess the number of jellybeans and you'll win a $100 gift certificate to UNIQUE. (No eating, no cheating!)

Even with UNIQUE prices, sometimes the Stockroom does things that can only be classified as crazy. (They get "UNIQUED OUT!") Hence their two-day SPRING FLING EVENT, where they "fling" the everyday Unique prices out the door in favour of some one-in-a-million supercalafrajulisticexpialadocious prices. (For a unique store, a unique adjective).

Serious savings on a unique selection of casual wear at the lowest prices in the UNIQUE-verse. "UNIQUE OUT!"

National Home Show: Special ideas for special places

Three new specialty centres, 700 exhibitors and a unique "show within a show" highlight the 43rd Annual National Home Show, April 8 to 17, at the Coliseum, Exhibition Place, Toronto. Sponsored by the Greater Toronto Home Builders' Association, this is North America's most comprehensive home show, attracting over 200,000 visitors each year.

The headline attraction is the Toronto Star Dream Home, featuring the amenities sought by today's cocooning family. Sponsored by the Home Builders' Association and Consumers Gas, the 3,800 square foot bungalow was built in separate modules at an indoor facility by Viceroy Homes, then assembled, finished and landscaped in the Coliseum. West Indies Plantation style furnishings by Oakville's Ennisclare Interiors provide the backdrop for a state-of-the-art home theatre by Mt. Pleasant Stereo, and an IBM home office by Home Computing & Entertainment. As every Dream Home needs a personality quirk, a hand-carved billiard table is placed right in the middle of the house.

This year, the Home Show will debut Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation's environmentally sensitive Healthy House. New Home Court will feature custom homes; and Mt. Pleasant Stereo will present the new Home Theatre Expo. The Toronto Star and CHFI/FM98 will also sponsor a draw for three Chrysler Neons.

Because most visitors have specific projects in mind, there are three specialty areas: renovation, decor and backyard living.

The Home Renovation Centre, presented by 104.5 CHUM FM, features the Lansing Buildall "How-To" Demonstration Area and $10,000 Shopping Spree contest, and insulation expert Jon Eakes. For any project big or small, professional or do-it-yourself, the exhibitors offer the products, services and know-how that turn renovation ideas into reality.

The Design and Decor Centre showcases furnishings, accessories, floor coverings, window treatments and other products that let interiors reflect their owners' personalities. Lynette Jennings, Editor of Select Homes & Food Magazine and star of television's HOME Show, will enlighten and entertain with a variety of design and decor techniques.

In the Outdoor Living Centre, gardens created by some of Ontario's finest landscapers provide the backdrop for 100 exhibitors of everything needed for outdoor living. Presented by "The Source - CFRB 1010", this Centre will also host the new Urban Backyard feature, and "Smart Yard" presentations by gardening author Jeff Ball.

The National Home Show is open weekdays noon to 9:30 p.m., Saturdays 10 a.m. to 9:30 p.m. and Sundays 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. Admission is $8.50 for adults, $5.50 for seniors and children eight to 14 years, and free for children under eight. This admission also covers the "show within a show" at the new National Kitchen & Bath Showcase in the Automotive Building. Co-produced by the National Kitchen & Bath Association and presented by 1050 CHUM, this Showcase is open April 13 - 17.

New ideas. On the house.

Q. How can I find the new ideas I need without driving all over town?

A draw at Rachel's Catering

Rachel and Joe Halawani are a husband-and-wife team who combine the expertise needed in cooking for large numbers of people with gourmet quality kosher food. They have been catering for 25 years. On completing his army service, Joe attended a hotelier school; he was an apprentice chef.

On completing his apprenticeship, Joe re-enlisted and spent six years as a kitchen manager in the Sinai. After leaving the army for the second time, he was head chef for Levys Catering at Ben Gurion Airport, which supplied not only the airport, but also El Al and other airlines.

Their single location, which also has a lunch counter, is Rachel's Deli & Appetizers, at 243 Wilmington Ave. in Bathurst Manor Plaza. Rachel manages this store, while Joe manages Rachel's Catering. Their in-store take-out products are meat and pareve, with a wide selection of Moroccan, Israeli and other Middle Eastern foods, as well as other dishes from around the world. No preservatives are added.

Rachel's Catering is under the supervision of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth of the Toronto Jewish Congress, and began catering for Pride of Israel Synagogue in December 1991. This is the company's only synagogue client. Usually, meetings with synagogue officials are held in the store, so the officials can taste the food. Over the last three months, Rachel's has invested $40,000 in new dishes and cutlery for the synagogue.

Rachel's also works with other banquet halls like Paradise, Terrace or Baycrest, and caters house parties. No contract is too small or big, whether for one person or 1,000. The growing list of regular customers includes many people from the offices and community organizations in the Finch-Dufferin area. Rachel's products are available at Food City in Thornhill and other locations.

Rachel's will hold a draw among the first 25 couples to book their wedding banquet through Rachel's at the Pride of Israel Synagogue. The prize will be the lesser of $10,000, or the cost of the catering excluding all applicable gratuities, service charges and taxes. Anyone who books through Rachel's qualifies, once the bill has been paid in full; the exceptions are principals or employees of the company, or their relatives.

The draw date will be scheduled as soon as 25 contestants qualify. The draw will be held at a courtesy Draw Dinner catered by Rachel's, where a member of Pride of Israel's Board of Governors will select the winning ticket.

Quasar Mode offers shortest route to Paris

The much-ballyhooed tunnel linking England and France is one shortcut to Paris, but you can experience Parisian style without travelling to France.

Precociously perched atop the Bay-Bloor subway station, Quasar Mode is the hot spot for French fashion in Toronto – and has been for 15 years. Same location, same ownership.

In the ever-changing face of Yorkville, Quasar Mode has endured the test of time, as have its exclusive collections. Headed by Chakok (Provence) and strongly seconded by Emmanuelle Khanh (Paris), Mariella Burani (Milan), Geneviève Tarka (Paris), and Boa (Paris), each line tells a story.

Launched in 1970 by Arlette Decok, the Chakok collection is "non-conformist in comfort", in Decok's words, and is inspired by the same countryside that moved Monet to create the floral masterpieces we know and love. Similar floral motifs show up with a rhythmic elegance in Decok's work, so your feeling of oneness with nature needn't be discarded at the art gallery door; you can "wear it and share it!"

In a French fashion boutique, it's only fitting that you be served by a French lady – and you are. The irrepressible Ginette Beauchamp, long known to her clients as a woman of warmth and joie-de-vivre, offers a service that goes far beyond fashion merchandising.. "I really don't see myself as selling "merchandise" says Beauchamp. "To me, each garment is a work of art, each shopping trip an excursion into new realms of colour and design. When I return from abroad, I share my findings with my clients. Coming to Quasar Mode should be like a leisurely visit to the art gallery."

It is – but here you can take home a masterpiece without spending a fortune. Most pieces carry from day to evening, allowing you to "cheat" and avoid budget-sapping wardrobe duplication.

Imagine a striking black jacket gilded with a few unexpected leaves – fanciful enough for the theatre, yet not risqué enough to raise eyebrows in the boardroom. It's one of many Quasar garments that walk a playful tightrope between business and pleasure. "Our clients will never renounce their femininity, but they must cope with the practical side of life. To these women, we offer the best of both worlds" says Beauchamp. "Each garment is handpicked for originality, in styles and fabrics that will endure the challenge of our fast-paced lives."

Another Chakok offering: floral muslin tunic with matching palazzo pants

Indeed. And the faster the pace, the greater the need to slow down. Nobody does this better than the French, so take a page from Ginette's book. Walk, don't run, to Quasar Mode – and take time to smell the roses you're sure to encounter there!

Renowned violinist dies

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A renowned Toronto violinist who was hired by Sir Ernest MacMillan in 1931 to play with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra for $15 a week died in Los Angeles recently at the age of 81.

Hyman Goodman, who was concertmaster of the Symphony from 1948 to 1967, died of heart failure in Valley Presbyterian Hospital in Los Angeles, where he had lived and worked since 1971. He had retired in 1988.

Born in Toronto, Goodman began playing the violin as a child, and in his teens he played in radio shows, theatres and hotels. From 1942-46, he was a flight sergeant bandsman with the Royal Canadian Air Force.

He played under some of the 20th century's best known conductors, including Sir Colin Davis, Sir John Barbirolli and Leopold Stowkowski. He also worked with popular musicians such as Paul Whiteman and Oscar Levant and was made concert-master of the Canadian Broadcasting Corp. orchestra.

After Goodman left the Toronto Symphony in 1966, he lived in Los Angeles where he enjoyed a successful freelance career. He toured Japan three times as concert-master for the Percy Faith Orchestra, and his playing can be heard on the soundtracks of several 1970s TV programs including Little House on the Prairie and of the film The Godfather.

He leaves his wife Sylvia, a daughter, harpist Erica Goodman of Toronto, and a grandson, Norman Stanford.

A memorial concert will be held Sunday, May 8, at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, as part of their regular music series, featuring the work of many Jewish composers who were friends of the late violinist. Taking part in the concert will be Trio Lyra with harpist Erica Goodman.

Hitler topic of French quiz show

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Concerns raised by Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) over how a popular French-language television quiz show would treat the touchy topic of Adolf Hitler appeared to be satisfied following a series of correspondences with Radio-Canada officials.

David Sultan, a policy advisor at CJC-Q, said Congress officials were mainly concerned that the weekly program, called Tous pour un, would trivialize the Holocaust by focusing on Hitler inside a game show format.

The general format of the program is to select an historical figure and to test a contestant's knowledge of the subject for prize money.

Past historical figures the program has focused on have included Charles de Gaulle and Tintin, the famous French comic strip character.

The three weekly segments devoted to Hitler, broadcast on Feb. 24, March 3 and March 10, also prompted concerns outside the Jewish community.

Pierre Bourgeault, a columnist for Le Devoir, considered the choice of Hitler "irresponsible," and writer Noel Audet, also in an opinion piece in Le Devoir, feared the show, by selecting Hitler, would reinforce a "positive image" of him and neglect to provide necessary historical context.

According to Sultan, Jacques Demers, the show's producer, sought to assure Congress that his program chose Hitler as a means to educate the public in light of rising racism and anti-Semitism. Sultan, as well, praised Demers and host Gilles Gougeons for treating CJC-Q's concerns seriously.

Still, Sultan said the program's first two episodes, which covered the period from 1929-39, did not fully meet Congress' expectations in terms of "sensitization" or providing a "substantial educational context."

The final episode, covering the period of the Holocaust, handled the subject matter "much more responsibly," Sultan said. The show contained more archival footage and documentation and set a tone more befitting the subject matter.

Sultan said CJC-Q received "a few" calls expressing concerns over the program. Copies of CJC-Q's correspondence with Radio-Canada officials were sent to Itzhak Levanon, Israel's consul general for Eastern Canada and to CJC-Q chair Manuel Shacter.

Sultan emphasized that Congress never asked Radio-Canada to cancel plans to air the shows, but only that they be done with as much sensitivity and context as possible given the format.

The organization's ultimate preference, he said, would have been for Radio-Canada not use a game show to deal with a subject like Hitler, since almost by definition there are questions of taste and decorum involved.

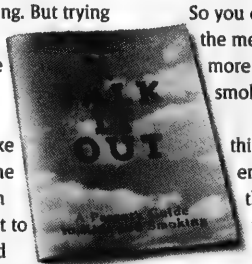
YOU CANNOT STOP YOUR CHILD FROM SMOKING

Frankly, the pressures of fitting-in combined with a natural curiosity could persuade even the strongest-willed child to try smoking. But trying once is not the same as trying more than once. And that's where you come in.



Help your children realize where that first cigarette could take them. Point out that nicotine is one of the most addictive drugs known to science – an even tougher habit to break than heroin or cocaine. And the fact that most smokers would quit tomorrow, if only they could.

It's a perfect time to share these thoughts. Because right now, your kids are seeing and hearing a province-wide anti-smoking campaign.

So you can bet it's on their minds. But of all the messages they receive, none will deliver more impact than yours. Even if you're a smoker yourself.

To prepare for your talk, call for this booklet. Then give your kids the encouragement they need to stop themselves from smoking. Before it's too late.

Filmmaker used her talents to showcase Hitler's agenda

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

At best, Leni Riefenstahl was an ambiguous figure in Nazi Germany.

She was never a member of the Nazi party, but she contributed her enormous talent to Hitler's malevolent cause.

An actress in the Weimar period, Riefenstahl became a director shortly after the Nazis' accession to power in 1933. Her best-known documentaries were Triumph of the Will, an esthetic hymn to the Nazis and their fuhrer, and Olympia, a rapturous paean to Olympic Games athletes.

That Riefenstahl's films were technically brilliant is beyond debate. What matters more, nearly 50 years after the ignominious fall of the Third Reich, is whether she was a Nazi propagandist.

You can judge for yourself thanks to Cinematheque Ontario, which is presenting a portfolio of her work under the title of The Wonderful, Horrible Films of Leni Riefenstahl.

Her putative masterpiece, Triumph of the Will, will be screened on April 8, on the same day Ray Muller's first-class documentary, The Wonderful, Horrible Life of Leni Riefenstahl, opens its run at the Metropolitan Cinema.

Olympia, and Riefenstahl's last movie, Tiefland, are scheduled to be shown on April 13. The two films in which she starred as an actress, The White Hell of Piz Palu and S.O.S. Iceberg, are set for April 8 and April 9, respectively.

I sat through Triumph of the Will and Olympia, and they are mesmerizing from a purely technical point of view. (A review of Miller's documentary appeared in The Canadian Jewish News fairly recently.)

Triumph of the Will was commissioned by Hitler to record the sixth annual Nazi party congress in Nuremberg in 1934. Riefenstahl maintains that the film is nothing more than a documentary. In essence, however, it exalts Hitler and his National Socialist movement.

Leni Riefenstahl

Wagnerian in proportions, and 111 minutes in length, Triumph of the Will begins in the clouds, as Hitler's personal plane soundlessly glides over the medieval city of Nuremberg.

Adoring crowds welcome Hitler's motorcade, and a fanfare of trumpets ushers in a pagan-like nighttime rally.

Photographed greeting citizens in folkloric costumes, Hitler comes across as an earnest and compassionate leader of the nation.

Riefenstahl mixes martial music, a sea of stiff-arm salutes, a panoply of swastika flags, a series of torch-light parades and rousing speeches by party faithful to convey the unmistakable impression that Hitler is leading Germany to recovery and greatness.

To hammer home this point, Triumph of the Will ends as Rudolf Hess ecstatically equates Nazism with Hitler and Germany with Hitler's destiny.

This is a powerful and affecting film which glorifies Hitler and elevates him to the status of a deity. In this sense, Triumph of the Will is the personification of the propagandist's art.

Like Triumph of the Will, Olympia is visually stunning, though too long at 225 minutes. It was commissioned by Germany as the official film of the 1936 summer Olympics in Berlin.

Working with an army of cinematographers, Riefenstahl dedicates it to the "youth of the world," who would soon see combat in World War II.

To Herbert Windt's brooding score, the camera pans on the ancient ruins of classical Greece, where the Olympics were conceived.

Then, in an inspired shift, the camera cuts to a nearly naked and sinuous discus thrower. Thus, in one stroke, Riefenstahl bridges a yawning gap in time.

Olympia celebrates the human form, and some would argue, the Aryan ideals of strength and beauty. It also caters to racial stereotypes of the day with its references to "Negro" athletes and the "white race."

Amid the tension of the athletic events, Hitler and his entourage appear in a variety of moods, always keenly interested in the proceedings.

By any yardstick, Olympia is an olympian cinematic feat. On a broader scale, it's tragic that so gifted a filmmaker put herself at the disposal of the most detestable regime in history.

Piety & Power: The World of Jewish Fundamentalism by David Landau (McLelland & Stewart $29.95)

The recent tragic incident at Hebron has focused attention on the haredim — the so-called ultra-Orthodox Jews in Israel and the Diaspora. Informed estimates put the Israeli haredim at around 300,000 out of a Jewish population of some four million, and the haredim in the Diaspora at 300-325,000. In 1992, the haredi parties in Israel won close to 10 per cent of the vote.

The haredim feel that the tide of Jewish history is turning their way, that after two centuries of retreat and shrinkage in the face of modernity, old style Orthodoxy is on the ascendancy. Writes the author of this absorbing study, "They are bursting at the seams, swelling in numbers, growing in self-confidence and in their determination to influence the world around them."

David Landau, a seasoned Israeli journalist, takes the reader into all aspects of haredi society, into the yeshivahs which are the intellectual core of the community, into the colorful "courts" of the chassidic rebbes, into the haredi home with its warm family life and stern sexual codes and into the international structure of gifts and mutual aid that help sustain young men who often spend decades of their lives as full-time students of the Talmud.

Piety and Power delves into the complexities of Israeli politics and society to show how the haredim, despite their theological opposition to the very existence of a non-messianic Jewish state, nevertheless adroitly work the system to their own advantage.

The Chabad movement of the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Menachem Mendel Schneerson, the best known and most active of the chassidic groups, has 3,000 shlichim, emissaries, who are to be found around the world from Hong Kong to Katmandou. They operate in places where there is no other organized Jewish life or community. Landau says, "They come uninvited, nail up a notice, 'Chabad House' — and launch their indefatigable search for Jewish souls."

The Lubavitcher Rebbe has always firmly opposed the return of any land taken from the Arabs and has influenced several Israeli general elections. He is certainly the dominant haredi personality of the post-war era. Some of his followers suggest that the Rebbe is the long-awaited Messiah. When he fell ill in 1992, some of his adherents insisted that his suffering was itself added evidence of his messianic potential and the imminence of the historic moment.

Among the Rebbe's fiercest adversaries is Rabbi Eliezer Shach, leader of Israel's Degel Hatorah Party — a 92-year-old charismatic haredi — who labels the Lubavitcher Rebbe a misguided leader who will bring tragedy to the Jewish people.

Like most young haredim, Chabad youth do not serve in the Israeli army. The exceptions are the Orthodox non-haredi students in the hesder yeshivahs, where students combine Talmud study with army service over a five-year period. Landau quotes Labor's Yossi Beilin as harshly criticizing the unwillingness of the haredim to do army service: if a student "can't get into a good yeshivah, he tries for a weaker one. If he fails again, he looks for a place with even lower standards. But eventually everyone finds somewhere. It is unprecedented in Jewish history. At the rate they're growing, there's bound to be an explosion. Israeli society won't stand for it forever."

Proud of their large families, their steadfast devotion to tradition and their disdain of modern values, the haredim are certain that the future is theirs. Rabbi Alexander Schindler, head of the Reform lay movement, warned his liberal cohorts that where the haredi philosophy alone prevails, it leads to "stale repression, fossilized tradition and ethical corruption."

The author writes in a clear, unadorned style and the information conveyed — interesting, surprising and arresting — should be of widespread interest.

Leslie Lester's WWII is sure not to disappoint

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Leslie Lester keeps her light under a bushel. The producing company of which she is a member, VideoCabaret does not list the names of its producers; so Lester's considerable accomplishments in the Toronto theatre world are a well-kept secret.

The CJN, however, is letting the cat out of the bag. Lester is one of the producers of a new play, WWII which opened March 31 at the Theatre Centre, 1032 Queen Street West, and runs to April 24.

One of the patrons on opening night, continuing her record of always attending Lester's openings, was her grandmother, Edna Lester. It's not surprising that the Lester family has turned out a theatre person. Two of Leslie's cousins are well-known in the arts: Lionel, a retired film distributor, and Malcolm, a publisher.

Another secret is that Lester and VideoCabaret have won Dora awards for previous plays in this cycle, of which WWII is the eighth. As well, the author, Michael Hollingsworth has won a Chalmers nomination for his seventh play in the series, The Life and Times of Mackenzie King. The series is called The History of the Village of the Small Huts.

"As a producer in alternative theatre, I have to do a lot with a little money, I beg, borrow and steal," said Lester. "But it's a satisfying job, keeps me away from being tied down to a desk."

This is the understatement of the year, because the productions of VideoCabaret are notorious for their complexity and innovations in staging, to say nothing of the pyrotechnics frequently found in the dialogue. One of its members, Deanne Taylor, once ran for mayor against Art Eggleton with the slogan, "art against Art."

Leslie Lester

WWII will not disappoint those theatregoers who like a red-blooded look at Canadian history and don't spare the horses. It does not gloss over mistakes made in Ottawa and on the fields of battle. One of its publicity posters quotes the words of Mackenzie King in the play: "We're not fighting this war to keep the world free of Nazis, nor to maintain the British Empire. We're fighting to keep the Liberal Party in power."

Ticket prices are $15, and $10 for war veterans and seniors. There is a pay-what-you-can matinee on Sundays at 2.30 p.m. The box office number is 538-0988.

Few Jewish performers listed in the ACTRA catalogue

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Only eight of 603 actors in a catalogue of disabled, visible and ethnic minority performers available for hire list themselves as Jewish.

This small number puzzles a spokesman for Alliance of Canadian Cinema, Television and Radio Artists (ACTRA) who told The CJN that the overall percentage of Jewish performers is far higher than that. Listing in the catalogue is voluntary.

Into the Mainstream is the title of the catalogue published by ACTRA and launched recently at a reception in the rotunda of Toronto City Hall. Anyone who is a member of ACTRA or of Equity, composed of professional theatre actors, is eligible to have their picture and career summary in it.

A segment of Reel Players was played at the reception showing how producers and directors, particularly those from outside Canada, depend on the multi-racial acting pool in Toronto. Among the movies mentioned as recruiting in Toronto were Kung Fu: The Legend Continues, said to be 98 per cent Canadian, Counter Strike and Robocop.

The catalogue also includes audible minorities, those who have a particular accent needed for the role, and accounts for the presence in it of dozens of performers who list British, Irish, Scottish, Jamaican, East Indian, native Canadian or French-Canadian accents.

Children's section

There are no Jewish performers listed in the separate children's section. Among the women listed as Jewish are Shelley Goldstein, Anais Granofsky (black and Jewish) and Judy Silver. Among the men are Paul Dorsey (Jewish, French, Mohawk and Cherokee), Joe Green (Japanese and Jewish), Brad Milne, Sam Moses and Ed Rice.

The launching was held in conjunction with the International Day for the Elimination of Racism.

"Not every white person is a racist and not every person of color is free of bigotry," said Sandi Ross, first woman president of ACTRA Toronto Performers' branch, who is black. She is the founding editor of Into the Mainstream.

"It is time for a moratorium on confrontational tactics," said keynote speaker June Callwood, the author-activist who has been at the centre of a dispute over her remarks to minority spokespeople.

"Sandi Ross has stuck her neck out a mile by inviting me; she's fearless," said Callwood.

A number of disabled performers wheeled their way around the rotunda during the reception.

Spielberg's List: Brief clips from no less than 11 megahits by Steven Spielberg were shown last month during a salute to the director by the American Museum of the Moving Image in New York. As reported in The Forward, Goldie Hawn, Richard Dreyfus, Oprah Winfrey and other actors who had worked with Spielberg voiced their appreciation and shared anecdotes.

Speaking before Schindler's List swept the Academy Awards, actor Ben Kingsley, who played Itzhak Stern in the film, said, "Steven put the camera to his heart and gut." Actor Liam Neeson said, "... At the gates of Auschwitz, I did not expect to find a man so raw, so scared, so angry. What Spielberg showed us is that it is possible to remain ethical and brave in this world."

Acknowledging the tributes, Spielberg admitted, "What scares me is that I don't know what will come after Schindler. The film has so profoundly changed my life."

Little known to Toronto audiences is that part of the soundtrack of Schindler's List features the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir. Film composer and conductor John Williams personally selected the choir and came to Toronto last fall to record with the choir in the CBC's Glenn Gould Studio.

Show Boat News: Well-known film and television actress Cloris Leachman is preparing for the role of Cap'n Andy's irascible wife Parthy in the Toronto production of Show Boat. She begins Aug. 16. Leachman is familiar to television audiences for portraying Phyllis in The Mary Tyler Moore Show in the '70s. She has appeared in more than 30 films, including The Last Picture Show, Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid and Young Frankenstein.

Book Launches & Klezmer: Common Knowledge Books, a shop at 602 Markham St. in Toronto, is offering an eclectic assortment of activities this month. Something being billed as a combination hootenanny, fundraiser, book launch and potluck shindig occurs April 10 at 3 p.m., and features the works of a 21-writer collective from southwestern Ontario.

Hear Dr. Milan Tytla, author of Come To Your Senses (All Eleven of Them), April 17, 2 p.m., and Edmund Fowler, author of Building Cities That Work, April 24, 2 p.m. An evening of "hot, passionate, raunchy sounds and dancing" happens April 28, beginning at 7 p.m., courtesy of Anne Lederman (of The Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band) and Friends. The sounds embrace Jewish wedding music, songs from Yiddish theatre, chassidic dances and chants.

O Come All Ye Faithful?: For obvious reasons, the Toronto-based Amadeus Choir's annual Christmas carol writing competition has probably moved or involved few readers of this column in its eight years of existence. But now its organizers have added a new "Chanukah" category. Even though the notion of a Chanukah carol may seem an oxymoron, the choir's earnest attempts to include non-Christian segments of society in its activities deserve praise. Those interested in submitting an entry should phone (416) 267-2796 for contest details. By mail: Amadeus Choir Carol Competition, 939 Lawrence Ave. E., P.O. Box 47569, Don Mills ON M3C 3S7.

Notes From All Over: Subject of a highly complimentary write-up in the last issue of City & Country Home, Toronto sculptor Janice Krangle uses chicken wire and welded steel to explore the relationship between human beings and animals.

Nine new metal pieces and her innovative Arboreal Series (which delves into the vegetable kingdom) go on display at the gallery at 89 Scollard St., Toronto, April 16 to 23, from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. daily.

Artist Mindy Yan Miller is one of four artists featured in Monuments in the Present Tense, an exhibit at the Ottawa Art Gallery, 2 Daly Ave., Ottawa, until April 24. Yan Miller's work also appears in a show at the Museum for Textiles, 59 Centre Ave., Toronto, until May 7. Montreal novelist Mordecai Richler is one of numerous writers slated to speak at the 1994 convention of the Canadian Booksellers Association (CBA), June 18 to 20 in Toronto. Other speakers include Roberta Bondar, Rick Hansen and Neil Bissoondath.

Call the CBA, 416-467-7884, ext. 222, for more information.

Recent works in watercolor and acrylic by artist Ellen Manel-Derrick are being shown this month at the Barbara Frum Library in the Lawrence-Bathurst area of North York. There Comes A Time ... is a new play that explores the interpersonal relations and issues that arise in the lives of senior citizens.

For a fee, participants may join a workshop to be directed by Sean Mulcahy at the Bloor Street 'Y', April 24, 1:30 to 5 p.m. Phone Luni at (416) 924-6211, for further information.

Magna International Frank Stronach

Frank Stronach wears many hats: he is founder and chairman of Magna International Inc., a successful race horse owner and breeder, a one-time Liberal candidate, an energetic community leader and a participant in charitable causes. Come this May, Stronach will also receive a Doctor of Philosophy, honoris causa from Haifa University.

Known as the "University of the North", the University of Haifa is widely recognized for the important role it plays in seeking to foster improved relations and greater understanding between Arabs and Israelis in the Middle East.

The youngest of Israel's universities, the 200-acre campus sits atop Mt. Carmel and serves a student body in excess of 10,000. The student body includes Israelis, Druze, Arabs, new immigrants and overseas students from virtually everywhere in the world.

The Frank Stronach Centre of Education for Peace will help as an important step towards building a network of human relations which will lay the foundation for a better understanding between the peoples of the Middle East.

Magna International is one of the world's largest and most diversified suppliers of automotive systems and components.

Stronach was born in Weiz, Austria and immigrated to Canada in 1954 with a working background in tool and machine engineering. In 1957 he opened a one-man tool and die shop in a rented garage in the Dufferin-Dupont area of Toronto.

The rocky road to success found Stronach facing insolvency in 1990. In 1992, with a debt load of $273.8 million, he predicted Magna would be debt free in three years; it is only the beginning of 1994 and he has reached his goal. Stronach spoke recently with The CJN's Stephanie Chapman.

CJN: How and why did your interest in Haifa University develop?

Stronach: To a certain extent, I'm a victim — but I should say, a willing victim. Sometimes when we think there is a good cause involved, we participate. It always takes people to initiate things. So, you have a number of people — Canadians — and Haifa University is very dear to them. Karen Miller approached me and said 'Look here, I have a project and I believe very strongly in it. Would you participate?'

I listened. I think I'm reasonably tuned in to world affairs. I travel a lot and I see a lot of problems. In the world we all are neighbors, and sometimes [because we are so far removed from a situation] we can see things from a different view and hopefully be helpful.

So, when it was brought forward to me, I said I would be very happy to participate. The project is basically a fundraiser that will raise between half a million and one million dollars that will be donated to Haifa University. Essentially what they have in mind is that it will be called The Frank Stronach Chair of Peace.

I think anytime we can make a contribution to peace, we should try. The world is a relatively small piece of real estate and we have to make sure that people can live in peace. When it comes down to it, people are people are people and it's really a matter of communication. Somewhere along the line, communication went wrong.

CJN: Haifa University enrols a high number of Arab students and it is noted for its work in facilitating co-operation among Israeli Arabs and Jews. How do you see the two groups eventually working together and how will Haifa University assist in this process?

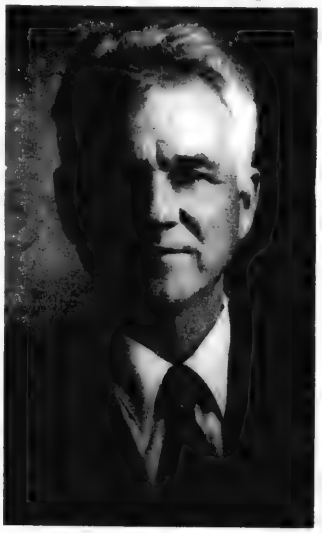
Stronach: Naturally, Haifa University has a board. They have a basic approach and basic philosophies that have been in existence for about 20 years so I do hope that they can make a small contribution.

One thing in the world that people are really afraid of is being dominated. That's why we have a break-up in all the different states in Russia and other parts of the world. People are afraid of being dominated by somebody else. To a great extent, domination means economics, right?



Most countries in the world have established human charters of rights and I think we have to be very careful to guard that. For those countries that haven't got one yet, the rest of the world has to work on it. First and foremost, a human charter of rights is needed to be part of civilized society.

That's one aspect. I believe very strongly that we could also establish economic charters. As the world has agreed on human charters of rights, I think we could also agree on economic charters of rights. And by doing that, we could diffuse the fear of being dominated.

I have a lot of experience in this and I would reflect on it and say 'Look that's the way we could do it and I think it would be a great contribution.' So I think I can take something to the table. Maybe a new dimension.

The history of mankind has always been dominated by the golden rule — the man who has the gold makes the rule. So we really have to look at dismantling the fear of domination. Then we can live as neighbors within our own cultures and practise our own religion. It's healthy.

CJN: How do you see peace being promoted through the business community?

Stronach: Again, the world has been so preoccupied with human charters of rights, which we have to applaud; but at the same time, it's time to talk about the economic charter of rights. I think I'm somewhat a pioneer in this because I think we are the only company with an economic charter of rights. These charters, hopefully used throughout the world, would lead to peace. I think that's the only way to lead to peace.

CJN: Outline some of your personal business philosophies.

Stronach: My personal business philosophy is that business is relatively easy — whoever can make a better product for a better price will get the greatest market share. It sounds easy, right? But, our specialty is human capital. What can we do to stimulate labor for greater productivity and ingenuity?

CJN: And what do you do?

Stronach: We have a labor charter of rights. Everything we do is transparent. We have an economic charter of rights that guarantees the employees 10 per cent of the profits. We have big posters in every factory which outline the principles — a clean, safe environment, fair treatment, no discrimination, competitive wages. If we have an employee who feels that isn't so, we have a hotline number and we have labor inspectors that check up on complaints. And if something like that happens, we back the employees to the hilt.

It's bad business to discriminate or be unfair. Do you know why? It makes people unhappy. And when people are unhappy, you can't make quality products at a competitive price. Very simple.

CJN: Would this translate directly into how you would implement those philosophies and apply them to Israel and the Middle East when peace comes?

Stronach: You can apply those all over the world. If something isn't right, somewhere along the line, there has to be a recourse to correct it.

CJN: You ran in the 1988 federal election as the Liberal candidate. How would you describe that whole experience?

Stronach: From time to time, as a person, I think you have to look in a mirror. If you feel strongly about something, do something about it. In reality, we always say 'I hope someone will do something about it.'

At the time, [even though I'm not a Liberal and have never been party member of anything] when I told Bill Davis that I was seeking political office, he said 'Frank, don't be so stupid. First of all, you're running for the wrong party. Secondly, you're in the wrong riding — it's a very rural conservative riding — and thirdly, you're not prepared for it.'

I said 'Bill, I think I'm intelligent enough to know that, but sometimes, when we look in the mirror, I think we should do the things we should do. I'm doing it.'

And I said, 'I know it is easier to swim down the stream and it is easier to flow with the wind, but I think that I'm made that way that if I feel I should do something, I will do it.'

But over and above I said, 'It's not the greatest sacrifice for me because if I don't get elected, I'm going to re-elect myself as chairman of Magna.' I had a great fallback position.

It was a good experience because democracy is very complex. Even though I thought I had a fairly good understanding — but it's very, very complex — I think I learned a lot from the process and as a result, I'm a wiser man.

CJN: You were quoted in a 1992 article, 'Never say never to politics.' Does this still stand true? Any future aspirations?

Stronach: I would say there are some very concrete things in life that you wouldn't do but anytime you see you could have a positive input in society — you should not say never, never, never.

It would be very unlikely that I would run for politics for a simple reason. To be in Parliament is to serve society. If this what you truly have in mind, then you have to assess yourself from time to time and ask 'Could I serve in some other capacity?'

I think I can. That role would be to work on economic charters and labor charters and so on. I think I could serve society very well that way.

CJN: Also in that 1992 article in the Financial Post you were quoted as saying, 'Magna will have a very disciplined growth. I feel strongly Magna will be a major corporation.' That was a little over a year ago; describe your company's progress.

Stronach: We have grown again by 30, 49, 50 per cent. Magna's up to 4 billion in sales now, we have 22,000 employees worldwide and Magna's got no debt.

CJN: So after you came through economic problems at the end of 1990, you are debt free now?

Stronach: We are debt free now. We did it by being focused and disciplined. Most of all, I built the company from scratch so I know every building block. The perception was always worse than the reality. Yes, we had expanded a bit too much with bank loans. The banks got a bit nervous when the economy turned down in 1990 — which you can't blame them for — but Magna always was a good company and still is. And we proved it.

CJN: What changes have you made in Magna to take the company into the '90s and beyond?

Stronach: We are in the transportation business. Cars — the shapes, the way they are driven and the way the motor runs — may change, but cars will always be around because they are part of our individual freedom. I don't mean there won't be trains and buses but I don't think you can have individual freedom unless you have individual transportation.

Astral empire undergoes $25 million expansion

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Harold Greenberg's Astral empire continues to expand, and the Montreal economy is largely the beneficiary.

Astral Communications Inc., of which Greenberg is chair and chief executive officer, is undergoing a $25 million expansion of its technical services. It has begun with the opening of two new plants in Montreal and Boca Raton, Fla.

The AstralTech Centre on Royalmount Avenue in Town of Mount Royal (TMR), inaugurated this month, has the capacity to duplicate 12 million videocassettes annually and has 250 regular employees (jumping to over 300 at peak periods).

A few days later, the Greenberg clan flew south to officially open AstralTech Americas, where compact discs, audiocassettes and videos are duplicated.

But the biggest news is expected April 5 when federal Finance Minister Paul Martin, Quebec Industry Minister Gerald Tremblay, and Montreal Mayor Jean Dore will gather at Astral headquarters to announce details of the construction of the new AstralTech motion picture laboratory and dubbing studios downtown.

The new video duplication centre on Royalmount represents an $8 million investment. The move into the 200,000 square-foot plant (previously owned by Benson & Hedges) doubles both the space and the capacity of this technical service, making it the biggest operation of its kind in Canada and the seventh largest in North America.

AstralTech previously had two video duplication centres, one on Cote de Liesse Road and one in Toronto. Montreal has come out the winner in the consolidation, because as Greenberg said: "I have faith in this province and in this country...My heritage is here."

In peak periods, such as before Christmas, the new facility can copy up to 50,000 feature-length videos a day on 4,000 industrial VCRs, running seven days a week around the clock. It's light years away from only nine years ago when Astral first got into duplication. Then, it boosted its ability to copy 350,000 videos annually and employed only 14 people. Then the video market took off.

Present for the opening ceremony were Sheila Finestone, federal secretary of state for multiculturism and the status of women; John Ciaccia, Quebec Minister of international affairs; and acting TMR mayor Pierre Brisebois.

AstralTech manufactures all videos for distribution in Canada for Buena Vista Home Video, which includes such bestselling Disney titles as Aladdin and Beauty and the Beast, as well as the soon-to-be-released Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs, and Columbia TriStar Home Video, whose recent releases include Cliffhanger and In the Line of Fire.

The company also does work for Canadian producers and distributors like the National Film Board and Radio-Canada.

The new duplication centre resembles a medical laboratory. Technicians work in smocks and caps, and the air is recycled 25 times each minute to keep the room clean and dust free.

Once completed, the cassettes are taken to quality control where computers check that each one is perfect at a rate of 100 cassettes every 15 seconds. A technician, who works at a slightly slower pace, makes spot checks.

The two packaging assembly lines can wrap 140 cassettes every minute, which are then stored or distributed immediately.

With sales of over $300 million a year and 1,400 employees, the publicly-owned Astral Communications is one of Canada's leading entertainment and broadcasting conglomerates, financing and distributing movie, video and television programming, as well as providing technical services to the industry.

Astral Home Entertainment is the country's largest wholesaler of prerecorded videos, and the Astral Broadcasting Group owns the biggest pay TV movie service in Canada, The Movie Network. It also has major interests in Canal Premiere/Viewer' Choice Canada, Super Ecran and Canal Famille, other pay-per-view outlets.

Greenberg, 63, dropped out of school at 14. In the 1950s he opened a second-hand camera store on Craig Street, in an uncle's old pawn shop.

But his big break — which he acknowledged at the inauguration — came in the early 1960s when he obtained the concession to the camera departments in the old Miracle Mart chain.

Greenberg saw the business as a way of keeping his family together after the death of their parents within the space of 16 months. He employed his three younger brothers, Harvey, Ian and Sidney, who are now top executives at Astral.

Greenberg hinted that Astral still has room to expand. "I'm committed to building the most modern CD manufacturing plant in this country," he said, pointing to the ample land at the back of the Royalmount Avenue centre.

The Boca Raton facility is capable of making 12 million CDs a year.

Device decreases tailgating accidents

By SIMON GRIVER
Special to The CJN

TEL AVIV — Accidents due to tailgating could be greatly reduced on the world's highways if an innovative device developed in Israel were to become standard equipment in cars.

Called Controlaser, it informs drivers of the distance and speed of the preceding vehicle. Invented and developed by Silicon Heights, a hi-tech company in Tel Aviv, it also calculates how long it would take to stop in a worst-case scenario.

"According to statistics, some 25 per cent of road accidents are due to tailgating," observes Avner Shur, managing director of Silicon Heights. "This isn't necessarily due to negligent driving, but because the human eye cannot judge speed and distance accurately, particularly when tired or under adverse weather conditions."

It struck Shur some years ago that while aircraft and ships have for many years used sophisticated instrumentation to monitor activity in their path, cars have always relied on the unreliable human eye. So he set about remedying the situation.

Installed above the dashboard near the windshield, Controlaser projects a light beam forward which is reflected by the vehicle in front. The instrument's computer then calculates the distance and speed of the car up front and also sounds a warning alarm if the driver is judged to be tailgating. The closer the gap becomes, the more rapid the alarm. The digital display clock of the instrument reads "safe" when the driver proceeds with adequate space between vehicles and changes to "slow" when the driver enters the danger zone. It is up to the driver to adjust his or her distance accordingly.

In addition, psychological tests have shown that Controlaser helps relieve the mental stress of driving by giving the driver a greater sense of being in command of the vehicle.

A Family Feast-ival

TORONTO — The second annual Good Food Fesitval is a celebration of the delicious and varied world of good food, home cooking and eating well.

The event will be held May 6-8 at the Automotive Building Exhibition Place.

The festival offers more than 100 cooking demonstrations and nutrition seminars to help families learn about every aspect of food. Recipe ideas, preparation tips and techniques will also be explored. Alongside these activities will be hundreds of foods to be sampled, bushels of new products to buy and loads of expert advice freely given.

Tickets will be available at the door. For more information, call 778-6483.

CIS Olim Big Business

ISRAEL — Aliyah is good for business, a recent survey conducted by the Tazpit Research Institute for the daily newspaper Yediot Achronot has found.

New immigrants from the former Soviet Union are big consumers — 92 per cent of the immigrant households surveyed had purchased televisions; 49 per cent had VCRs; 84 per cent owned a washing machine; 58 per cent an electric heater; 55 per cent an electric mixer; 14 per cent a personal computer; and 11 per cent an air conditioner.

Forty-two per cent of the households have purchased permanent housing and of those who arrived in 1989 or 1990, 53 per cent have bought housing.

The survey found that 36 per cent have been issued credit cards. Banks consider olim from the Soviet Union to be good credit risks; experience shows they are less likely than veteran Israelis to default on payments.

Bank To Reopen On West Bank

JERUSALEM — The Bank of Jordan has received a license to open its doors again on the West Bank.

The licence, granted March 16, enables the bank to re-establish a West Bank presence for the first time since the Six Day War.

The bank's first branch will open in Ramallah, with others scheduled to follow.

The civil administration in the territories and Israel's supervisor of banks are involved in negotiations with other Arab banks to enable them to set up branches in the West Bank and Gaza.

Banking sources note that talks with local businessmen in the territories about establishing a Palestinian bank in the West Bank are also progressing.

A partnership between Israel's Bank Leumi and Palestinian interests to set up a joint banking project in the West Bank has been suggested by the Palestinians in December, shortly after Jordan reached an agreement on banking with Israel.

Foreign Currency Boxes

TORONTO — Ever wondered what to do with your leftover rubles, yen and drachmas?

Mount Sinai Hospital has found a new and innovative way to put foreign currency to good use. The hospital has set up foreign currency boxes in its main lobby and admitting area at 600 University Ave.

All denominations of foreign bills and coins are accepted and redeemed by Thomas Cook Foreign Exchange. The proceeds will support patient care, teaching and research at the hospital and its Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute.

Missile Stopping Shopping

ISRAEL — Marketing missle detection systems isn't as simple as placing your product in a briefcase and knocking on doors. There are trade shows to show off the latest in military technology.

Israel Industries Ltd. recently conducted a sales pitch in America for its new missile defence product, Piano.

Piano provides accurate early warning, not only against missile attacks, but incursions by enemy aircraft as well.

Piano was developed entirely at Israel Industries, which is a government-owned mix of development and manufacturing operations. Some of the firm may soon be privatized.

Israel Cable Battles

ISRAEL — A recent Israeli court order to disband a program purchasing service on behalf of several cable TV companies has intensified cable competition.

Six years ago Israel Cable Programs (ICP) was formed to buy shows and arrange for them to be screened. However, Israel's newest TV channel, the Second Television and Cable Authority, known as New Channel 2, claimed the ICP arrangement harmed its ability to acquire programs.

The court bought the argument made by New Channel 2. However, any one company in the ICP conglomerate can purchase material for the others. Some of the ICP cable stations are partially owned by the same companies with investments in New Channel 2.

Fighting Boycott Compliance

ISRAEL — Israel is strongly urging Sweden to stay away from the Arab economic boycott.

Despite signing a free trade agreement with Israel, Sweden reportedly complies with the boycott.

A Swedish economic delegation travelled to Israel for talks on the matter.

Israel's trade ties with Sweden are increasingly one way. Last year Israeli exports amounted to $59 million, but imports stood at $293 million, with car imports accounting for $136 million.

Israeli companies are finding Sweden's recession and the krone's devaluation are sizeable impediments to exports.

Renewed Inflation Worries

ISRAEL — Bank of Israel Governor Jacob Frenkel has once again taken up the fight against inflation.

At the end of last year, the Bank raised interest rates on monetary loans as an inflation fighting measure. Now, Frenkel has sent a letter to Israel's cabinet warning that rising prices will result from the excessive amount of money in the economy.

According to Frenkel, the money supply grew by about 35 per cent in 1993, partly because the peace process gave the economy a big boost.

He is warning of even tighter money policies to ensure price stability.

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN

TORONTO — On March 29 there was a big bash for the employees of Downsview Chrysler as they celebrated their first anniversary in their new quarters on Allen Road, north of Sheppard Avenue.

The dealership covers six sprawling acres. Business is conducted in a 46,000-square-foot building which includes offices, a show room, body shop, and service, leasing and parts departments. There are 80 employees.

The cars in stock — new and used — sit on a parking lot the size of a football field. It is so massive that in warm weather customers use a golf cart to get around the lot to view the cars.

In an average year, the company does about $38 million in sales. Roughly 1,600 new and 700 used cars are sold and 250 cars are leased annually. The body shop, service and parts departments bring in close to five million dollars a year.

Peter Kepecs, president of Downsview Chrysler, said the company was somewhat affected by the recession two years ago, but it escaped relatively unscathed. "We haven't felt it like GM [General Motors] and Ford."

He said that at least five Toronto-area GM dealerships have gone bankrupt, but he's not aware of any Chrysler bankruptcies. Kepecs thinks they were spared because Chrysler has been steadily increasing its share of the market: it has 20 per cent; GM has 30 per cent, but that's down from 55 per cent.

He said new and used car sales at his dealership were up 18 per cent last year and he expects this year's sales to top last year's figures, because many people need to replace their older-model vehicles.

"The average age of a car on the road today is seven-and-a-half-years old — that's the longest stretch [of people putting off buying new cars] in history," Kepecs said.

He also attributes the increase in car sales last year to the decline in interest rates. He does not think the recent rise in rates is going to significantly affect car sales.

He said Chrysler's biggest selling car is the minivan or magic wagon — the company sells more of these models than the combined sale of minivans in all the other car companies. Minivans make up 50 per cent of sales at Downsview Chrysler. Kepecs sees the success of the minivan as a reflection of Chrysler's inventiveness as a company and its ability to predict the needs of the market. But he also credits Chrysler's success to other factors.

He stressed the improvement in the quality of the product. He said the competition from the Japanese car companies forced Chrysler to produce a better car at a better price, to regain its share of the market. "We had no choice — we had to change," he said.

He added that the cars are made better and they require less maintenance; with the improved product, Chrysler could offer warranties which were attractive to customers. Most of their cars are warranted for 115,000 kilometres or seven years. It used to be 90 days.

Kepecs said it wouldn't be profitable for Chrysler to offer such extensive warranties if the cars needed a lot of repairs because Chrysler would have to cover the costs of such repairs.

He also thinks Chrysler, like other domestic car makers, is benefiting from the changing social values of the '90s — people are less inclined to flaunt their wealth. He said people are buying more moderately priced domestic cars because expensive foreign cars aren't the status symbol they used to be — "BMW, Jaguar and Mercedes are really taking a beating."

The cars of the '90s have many safety features. Chrysler was the first company to make duo air bags standard equipment on all domestic cars. The company also uses steel beams to strengthen the bodies of the cars. Anti-lock brakes, which kick in during bad weather, is an optional safety feature.

Kepecs said the air-conditioning systems have been modified to make the cars more environmentally friendly. Freon gas is no longer used to cool the air because it destroys the ozone layer. The new substance is not discharged into the air, but retained in the air-conditioning equipment.

Kepecs joined Downsview Chrysler in 1970, after completing a two-year program in automotive studies at Centennial College. He chose to work at a Chrysler dealership because he loved cars and thought the company had an exciting product.

He started in the parts department and then moved into sales, eventually becoming sales manager. He was offered an opportunity to buy into the company because the three owners were retiring or semi-retired.

He said they knew that absentee ownership would not be good for the business so they made him a partner. Kepecs will groom somebody within the dealership to take over as president.

'Soviet' women finding long lost Jewish roots

By ELEANOR SHAPIRO
Jewish Bulletin Of Northern California

SAN FRANCISCO — Before Svetlana Yakimenko met Sallie Gratch, "Jew" was just a word stamped in her Soviet passport.

Like most Jews raised in the former Soviet Union, Yakimenko — whose grandmother told stories of growing up Orthodox — came from a non-religious home.

The 40-year-old English instructor's first step back to Judaism was on a road near St. Petersburg and a chance encounter with Gratch, a social worker and Jewish activist from Chicago.

Today Yakimenko, along with Gratch and others, is helping to organize the International Conference of Jewish Women in Kiev, the first to take place in the former Soviet Union.

The two women recently visited the Bay Area to raise funds and encourage local women to come to the May 23-27 meeting.

"Women are the soul of life in the Jewish community," says Yakimenko, who describes them as more interested in rituals and ceremonies, as well as the Jewish way of raising children.

"They don't want their kids to be without roots," she says, "like they were all their lives."

Yakimenko's daughters, ages 11 and 15, are enthusiastic helpers who are looking forward to the event.

The word is being spread by a group called Kesher. Hebrew for connection, Kesher was founded by Gratch to link the emerging Jewish communities in the former Soviet Union with the larger Jewish world.

Strengthening Jewish identity, the Chicago woman says, makes Jews in the former Soviet Union "stronger as people, because they understand who they are," regardless of whether they ultimately emigrate or choose to stay.

For more than three years, Gratch frequently has joined Yakimenko in her search for isolated pockets of Jews in small towns throughout the former Soviet Union. They bring practical advice and modest funding, as well as gifts such as mezzuzot or menorot. Often, Gratch is the first Jewish foreigner they have met.

Gaining respect among neighbors

Those communities, which once kept their Jewishness private, "are regaining their pride," Gratch says. They also are gaining respect among their non-Jewish neighbors, by taking such steps as refurbishing the local Jewish cemetery or forming Jewish cultural societies.

Such a society was organized in Shpola, population 3,000, after Gratch and Yakimenko visited the town located two hours from Kiev.

When they first came, "word spread mouth-to-mouth among the 120 Jews. More than 100 showed up at the small club rented for the evening," Yakimenko recalls.

"When Sallie started to speak, people started to cry. It was the first time they had come together as Jews — and learned they were no longer separated from world Jewry."

The conference, says Yakimenko, is particularly geared for Jewish women in places like Shpola, so they can acquire the grassroots skills to organize institutions and the knowledge to live fully Jewish lives.

Although mail takes as long as a month to arrive, and phone lines are shaky, more women have contacted Yakimenko — mostly from Russia, Belarus and Ukraine — than the conference can handle.

Those who do come will be fully subsidized, with grants from the Nathan Cummings Foundation, the Max and Anna Levinson Foundation, and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, which is also providing logistical support.

Participants will get hands-on experience ranging from performing an aliyah at the Torah and learning different ways of observing Shabbat to workshops on Jewish history and organizing social service agencies and schools.

And they will get a chance to meet women whose own grandparents might have come from the same towns and villages.

While arrangements are being made beforehand to facilitate those connections, Gratch is determined to take the conference beyond the "feel good" stage.

"The conference is a jumping-off point for both communities," she says. "Our interest is getting the people what they need."

Based on personal ties she anticipates will be created at the international meeting, Gratch hopes the Western participants will continue to raise money after they return home.

The Westerners, she says, "will have a better idea of what's required," so they can help the Jewish life again taking root, where it once flourished.

RIGHTEOUS AMONG THE NATIONS

Israel closes off Gaza, West Bank

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The closure of the territories, extended at last Sunday's weekly cabinet meeting for at least another week, threatens to cripple sections of Israel's economy and the livelihoods of tens of thousands of Palestinians in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank.

Such were some of the assessments made at the cabinet meeting about the implications of sealing off the territories.

But Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin told his cabinet that the closure "must reaccustom the country to being independent of the territories for its labor force."

Communications Minister Shulamit Aloni, of the Meretz bloc, warned that the closure could bring the territories' two million people to the point of starvation.

The Israeli Army's commander for the southern sector said the closure will make life "very difficult for the Gazans and is likely to increase violence there."

"If we want to advance peace, we have to let these people be more relaxed and allow (PLO Chairman Yasser) Arafat to come to an area where Hamas will not be in control, where there will be a better mood," Aloni said, referring to the Islamic organization that has taken responsibility for the recent attacks on Israelis in which eight were killed.

"When we are talking about making peace, their situation will never have been worse than it is today," Aloni said of the residents of the territories. "We cannot ignore their needs."

Israel has closed off the territories before, including in late March, 1993. This closure is seen by some to be a delicate maneuver that must provide for Israelis' need for security without jeopardizing the peace process.

In Israel, those most affected by the closure are the building trades and agriculture, which, since 1967, have become increasingly dependent on cheap Arab labor.

The order to close the territories came April 7 — one day after a suicide car-bomb attack in the northern Israeli town of Afula claimed the lives of seven Israelis, most of them high school students.

After Sunday's cabinet meeting, it was learned the closure would extend beyond Israel's Independence Day celebrations on April 14, the date originally selected as the final day of the closure.

Reform in Canada debates outreach

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Reform Jewish leaders in Canada are expressing mixed reactions to — and in some cases outright rejection of — their U.S.-based leader's controversial call for outreach to non-Jews.

Still causing waves across North America are remarks made last autumn by Rabbi Alexander Schindler, president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC), Reform Judaism's umbrella body, at its biennial convention in San Francisco.

In his keynote address, Rabbi Schindler called for the movement to reach out to non-Jews — specifically, for non-Jews to be given a greater role in Jewish rituals, including being allowed to handle the Torah scroll and recite blessings; to take part in life-cycle events; and to be buried in Jewish cemeteries.

Reform's spiritual guide also advocated setting up a $5 million capital fund, interest from which would be used to seek converts from among secular non-Jews and "reach out to all who are seeking religious meaning in their lives." This "active pursuit," he said, would be for "those of our neighbors who belong to no church."

Response to Rabbi Schindler's speech was lukewarm. Parts of it were rejected out of hand by those who believe Reform Judaism needs boundaries and that if Christians are handed extra privileges in synagogue rites, there is little point in being Jewish.

Predictably, Rabbi Schindler's ideas provoked less than favorable reaction from Conservative and Orthodox Jewry, with the former charging the proposals would "do violence to the integrity of Judaism" and the latter saying Reform was launching "another public relations numbers game."

While the latest ripple in the theological pond does not necessarily signal a widening gulf between Canadian and American Reform Jews — in the way a rift has developed between left-leaning U.S. Conservative Jews and their more small-c conservative Canadian counterparts — it has unleashed a full-blown debate on where the "Jewish" in Judaism begins and ends.

For the most part, Reform Jewish leaders in Canada are willing to give Rabbi Schindler the benefit of the doubt, up to a point. His call for a greater role for non-Jews in life-cycle events — for example, allowing a non-Jewish parent to drape a tallit on a bar or bat mitzvah child, or hold a baby at a bris — is generally being interpreted as one way of preventing the splitting of intermarried families and the alienation of non-Jewish spouses.

On the other hand, Canadians, and a lot of American leaders, seem to be saying that giving non-Jews an increased role in rituals and synagogue life would blur the boundaries between Judaism and Christianity, while arming Reform with cash to go after unaffiliated Christians would send a signal to mainstream Christians that it's acceptable to missionize to Jews.

Although each of Canada's 23 Reform congregations sets its own rules within a general framework, in the "overwhelming majority" of them, a non-Jewish spouse of a Jewish member is not considered for participation in ritual observance, says Rabbi Daniel Gottlieb, executive director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, the UAHC's arm here.

Canada's Reform temples admit families and none would allow an individual non-Jew to join, explained Rabbi Gottlieb.

The council recently passed a resolution calling for a "full and open debate" on Rabbi Schindler's proposals.

"While we affirm our support for the programs of the UAHC's outreach department, particularly those designed to encourage Jews-by-choice and to facilitate the integration of multi-faith families into the life of the synagogue, we recognize that a significant percentage of our rabbis and lay people are not supportive of an expanded role for the non-Jew," the resolution states.

The council has called on member synagogues to formulate their own policies. Congregations are advised to examine non-Jews' roles in membership, voting, participation in brotherhoods, sisterhoods, religious classes and youth groups; committees and governing boards; life-cycle events, participation from the bimah, and cemetery privileges.

In the United States, all that is old hat. A 1991 UAHC survey found that in 62 per cent of U.S. temples, non-Jews may vote on congregational issues; 87 per cent allow non-Jews to serve on committees and half allow them to be committee chairs; 90 per cent allow gentiles to participate from the bimah in life-cycle ceremonies; 40 per cent allow non-Jews to kindle Shabbat candles in front of the assembled congregation and 22 per cent allow non-Jews to have aliyot.

As for increased roles for non-Jews in Canada, "there's been much more controversy and it's not found support in the Canadian Jewish community," Rabbi Gottlieb noted. "In the area of ritual, the Canadian Reform community maintains a clear consensus that there should be restrictions and boundaries."

As far as Rabbi Gottlieb is concerned, interest from a $5 million pool of money to fund outreach "is not an unreasonable amount to support such a program. There's no suggestion on the part of Rabbi Schindler that this outreach to [unaffiliated] Christians should have a higher priority than the work we already do."

But Rabbi Gottlieb would prefer the movement to more aggressively implement another call 15 years ago from Rabbi Schindler: that Reform convince non-Jewish spouses to convert.

In the meantime, a group of 25 Reform rabbis, including six from Canada, met recently in Chicago to formulate a response to the latest appeals.

A steering committee of 10 rabbis was set up, with Rabbi Michael Stroh of Temple Har Zion in Thornhill, Ont. as one of two co-chairs.

Rabbi Schindler's "primary concern," according to Rabbi Stroh, is that families with a non-Jewish member not be split. As for non-Jews being permitted to handle the Torah, Rabbi Schindler "has clarified his views: he's not recommending it as policy."

Nevertheless, Rabbi Stroh has also come down on the side of tradition.

"Non-Jews can come to services and take adult education classes. But it's not appropriate for non-Jews to participate in a way that implies Jewish commitment or that erases the boundary between Jews and non-Jews," he says. The Chicago group "is concerned that that boundary not be eroded."

Survivor recalls day he was liberated

Now lives in British Columbia

By MAURICE LUCOW

Peter Gary — a survivor of the Warsaw Ghetto, Majdanek, Dachau and Bergen Belsen — is a retired musicologist and composer who moved to Victoria from Los Angeles two years ago with his family. Since his arrival in the British Columbia capital, he has been involved in school educational programs about the Holocaust.

Gary recounts his horrifying experiences in the camps in One Man's Holocaust, in which he tells of his and his mother's arrest in 1941 Budapest.

Although Hungary was an ally of Germany, the country was not under German occupation at the time. Gary said he lived the life of a typical "spoiled upper class teenager, an only child," until the Nazis moved in and grabbed them. His father was not home.

The mother and son were taken with a truckload of other Jews to the Polish border. On Christmas Eve, the Germans machine-gunned the group in an open trench. Gary's mortally-wounded mother fell on him, but he was not hit.

Somehow, Gary and a few others made their way to Warsaw. He was shipped off to Majdanek, Dachau and, ultimately, Bergen Belsen.

Sick with pneumonia and typhoid, he worked by removing bodies from the barracks. On that "magic day," April 15, 1945 — his birthday — the camp was liberated.

Gary recalls the liberation in these excerpts from his book.

Then . . . it happened. I could not believe it. The magic date, April 15. I had not worked for a week as I was too ill and undernourished. I was convinced I would be gassed at any hour. But the miracle was about to happen!

We woke at the crack of dawn but something strange was going on in the spring air. There were no dogs barking and I did not see any of the usual SS outside. Somebody rushed in to exclaim excitedly that all the guard towers were deserted.

We crawled or walked to the window. Mostly crawled, because by this time most of us were the living dead. Sure enough, no Nazis. Then from the other side of the open field, it seemed like a thousand ants were approaching. We heard the rumble of tanks but could not determine whose they were.

We soon found out. It was the British army. Five of us embraced with tears flowing down our faces. Is it all over . . . the horror of months and years? As for me, the suffering was 4½ years — an unspeakable time to live in deprivation. Now what? Where do I go from here? Will I survive? What will my life be?

The loudspeakers informed us in German, Polish and French that it was the British army and to stay in our barracks. But the near-dead began to emerge. All those who could move came out to take a breath of the fresh air of freedom. Freedom? What is it? What will it bring?

The soldiers were in shock when they saw us. Many were crying, giving up their jackets and food rations. Some medics with an officer came to determine who had a chance of recovery. These would be taken to a small SS hospital. The British wanted to save us all but they were not prepared for what they had to face in Belsen. Medical school had never trained them for this.

The officer, Dr. Geoffrey Deanbourne, moved among the inmates. "Not this one, not this one," he said. He finally got to me and again proclaimed, "Not this one." I snorted: "Thanks a lot. What you are doing is what the Nazis did to us. You're cruel. Oh please God, there must be an end to this." I was sobbing.

The doctor said: "Take him to the hospital." Two medics picked up my stretcher, put it on a truck and drove me and others to the hospital. The women nurses smiled encouragingly and assigned us a real bed, with sheets and pillow. They stripped the lice-infested rags off us and bathed us in warm water. A bed? Warm water? The first time in so many years I laid on white sheets with a pillow. I could not help crying continuously. They put a needle in my bony arm with a liquid in it. It hurt like hell.

A boyish looking doctor examined me and said: "You'll be as good as new in no time." I fell asleep and slept the whole day.

The next afternoon, Dr. Deanbourne came to visit me, pulled up a chair and questioned me about what happened in the camps. The more I told him, the more he wanted to know. It was close to midnight before he left me and I fell back to sleep. Next morning he returned, with a pack of goodies and a smile on his face. He was one of the kindest people I ever met, and he personally helped get me out of bed the first time after several days.

The doctor sort of adopted me. He had a family in England and showed me pictures. I had none. No pictures, no graves, nothing. But thanks to him, slowly, I came back to life, physically and emotionally. He tried to readjust me into the real world of humanity. He brought me books.

I settled in a room in one of the SS barracks, which had been turned over to the refugees. The thought of going home entered my mind — but going home? The memories, the bitterness, the hurt was too strong, even after I found out my father was alive. I had no desire to walk the streets shoulder to shoulder with the same people who actively or passively contributed, if not with a gun in hand, but with great delight, to our sufferings. On a more positive note, I felt that at my age I better start living my own life. No more the spoiled child. The boy is gone forever. I would like to see a man rise out of the ashes.

I applied to a nearby American military office for a job and was assigned to the CIC (Military Counter-Intelligence Corps) division.

I got my education in humanity as I learned of the enormous human suffering and loss of life in the nations of the East and West. And I learned they were preparing for more confrontations. The newly unleashed power of nuclear energy was demonstrated in the holocaust of Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

Will mankind never learn?

Yom Ha'atzmaut

By DROR ZEIGERMAN

Forty-six years ago the State of Israel was created as a Jewish homeland, fulfilling the Zionist dream of gathering the Jewish people in Eretz Yisrael. In the 46 years of her existence, the State of Israel has seen her population grow from half a million to over four million Jews today

The gates of Israel were opened to allow oppressed people in countries around the world the chance to immigrate to Israel. Welcoming people from Eastern Europe, Russia, Ethiopia and the Arab countries became the main struggle of our country. These immigrants have become part of Israeli society as cultural, political and economic leaders. We are proud of their accomplishments and their major contributions to Israeli society.

In order to successfully absorb these people we need the support of the world Jewish community. This support will have to be political, financial and personal. Aliyah forms the essence of our existence and we must encourage aliyah from the West. If we succeed in absorbing these people, Israel will flourish. Successful absorption will open the way for economic independence.

In order for the Zionist dream to be realized, we must achieve peace with our Arab neighbors. In the past year we have made important progress with the Palestinians; the real test will be if both sides can implement the agreement. Israel has decided to speak with the PLO, our long-standing enemy, in order to prevent another war for the next generation.

On Yom Ha'atzmaut it is important to stress the consensus of the people of Israel: united Jerusalem will forever be the capital of Israel; our desire for peace makes us ready to compromise with our enemy; and we believe that peace will help us fulfill the Zionist dream of gathering Jews in the land of Israel to live in security. I hope that in the coming year Jordan, Lebanon and Syria will join Egypt and sign a peace agreement with Israel.

Only if we succeed with peace and absorption will we achieve the dream and provide a quality of life befitting a great nation.

We see the Jewish community throughout the world, including Canadian Jews, as partners in this exciting process. Israel shares strong ties with the Diaspora and Jews always have a home in Israel.

Righteous Gentiles, survivors honored

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario's Lieutenant-Governor joined members of the legislature and officials from Israel's consulate at Queen's Park last Thursday, April 7, to honor Holocaust survivors, partisans and, most notably, a Righteous Gentile couple.

Three former partisans and seven survivors now living in Metro received plaques of recognition, signed by Premier Bob Rae, from Lt.-Gov. Henry Jackman and Minister of Citizenship Elaine Ziemba.

But the focus of the second annual Yom Hashoah V'Hagvurah reception at the Legislature, sponsored by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, was the awarding of Righteous Among the Nations status to Joyce Miedema of Bowmanville, Ont., and, posthumously, to her late husband Pieter.

Joyce Miedema, now 79, helped her husband hide more than 20 Jews in their native Holland during World War II.

A minister in the Dutch Reform Church in the northern region of Friesland, Rev. Miedema was motivated by his faith to hide Jews in the couple's own home, other homes or in the forest, his wife told the gathering.

The Nazis began deporting Dutch Jews in 1941. In the spring of 1942, the couple temporarily took in two Jewish boys after no one else would accept them. Then Rev. Miedema found hiding places for 14 children who had to be evacuated from a Jewish children's sanatorium.

Later he built an underground bunker in the woods, complete with furniture and a kitchen, for four members of a Jewish family.

The couple took in a tailor, a medical student and a Jewish resistance worker who was later betrayed and shot.

After the war, Rev. Miedema received citations from the Resistance and the Allies, but their church was upset the couple had involved themselves in Resistance activities, and they were transferred to another parish.

The Miedemas came to Canada in 1952. Rev. Miedema died last August.

The couple were not honored before by Yad Vashem because "my husband did not believe his actions were worthy of praise. As a minister of the Gospel, he felt he was called to speak for those who had no voice," a tearful Joyce Miedema said.

She accepted her and her husband's specially-struck medal from Israel's consul general in Toronto, Dror Zeigerman.

Also on hand were Ontario Liberal leader Lyn McLeod; Liberal MPPs Elinor Caplan, Monte Kwinter and Steven Offer; Tory MPPs Charles Harnick and Don Cousens; Israel's vice-consul, Haim Waxman; and Canadian Society for Yad Vashem national co-

Message from President of Israel:

Pride and hope mark 46th Independence Day

On its 46th Independence Day, Israel looks at its history and future with pride and hope. Pride at becoming an independent country, strong and vibrant, and hope for the chance to achieve peace after a century of wars and hostility. We share this pride and hope with our brethren and friends around the world.

Traditionally, Independence Day is a day of summing up and retrospection. We recall the days before the War of Independence, before the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948. We remember our history, more than 2,000 years of exile and dependence, days when Jews prayed for their own homeland in which to live as a free nation.

In 46 years, Israel has become a nation of 5.3 million people. Israel has become the second largest Jewish community in the world and will soon become the largest. During this period we have succeeded in building a strong and viable economy. Israel exports goods to a value of $23 billion a year. Israel's GNP has reached $65 billion. New factories are being built in Israel, new ventures are being undertaken and the future looks bright and promising.

In the last year alone, 77,000 new immigrants from the Russian Federation, the Independent Republics, Europe, South Africa, Latin America and North America came on aliyah and settled in Israel, making it their new home. This continual immigration has assisted the growing prosperity of the Israeli economy.

In my new capacity as President of Israel, I have been privileged to tour the country, meet its people and see its cities and villages. I cannot even try to share with you the striking impressions I draw from my visits. Only by seeing for oneself can one truly become aware of the tremendous development taking place in Israel.

Ezer Weizman

Independence Day is a day of reflection and pride in our achievements. It is also a day of reflection on what should still be achieved. There are places in Israel where further economic development is needed, where satisfactory housing is missing, where poverty reigns. Much has still to be done to make Israel a Promised Land for its people and for the Jewish world. I am sure that with the imminent achievement of peace and with the redirection of national resources, we will be able to realize the true meaning of Zionism.

The last year has witnessed the continuation of the peace process and the signing of the Declaration of Principles. Peace negotiations are being held between Israel and all its Arab neighbors. More than 15 years ago, the first peace accord between Israel and its largest Arab neighbor, Egypt, was signed. Now years later we approach the widening of the peace cycle. Obstacles and hurdles are to be expected, but I am certain that peace is inevitable — is bound to come to our region.

It is my first year in office as President of Israel, and I wish to take this opportunity to address you on this day, not only on Israel and its achievements and targets, but also on the relations between Israel and Jewish communities in the world. Together we face the threat of assimilation and the loss of Jewish identity. We should direct our attention and resources to Jewish education and the preservation of our Jewish identity. A new partnership should be formed, a partnership of equality. We face new challenges which require unity. Only in unity and togetherness will we be able to face the end of the 20th century and the beginning of the third millenium.

In conclusion, let us all look to the future. Israel today is stronger than ever before. Israel is a reality in the Middle East, with extensive economic and diplomatic relations with most of the countries in the world. We can look back with satisfaction, remembering that it was only 46 years ago that Jews had nowhere to go. The establishment of Israel is a victory of the Jewish people and the Jewish spirit. What better words can describe it than the old unforgettable words of Psalms:

אז ימלא שחוק פינו ולשוננו רנה..
שובה ה' את
שבותנו כאפיקים בנגב.
(תהילים קכוי)

When the Lord brought the exiles back to Zion, we were like those who dream. Our mouths were filled with laughter, and our tongues with song. . . . Restore us from captivity, O Lord, like streams in the Negev . . . Psalm 126.

Justice Minister Allan Rock to examine war crimes case list

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Justice Department's war crimes unit has submitted a list to Attorney General and Justice Minister Allan Rock to determine whether any of the cases warrant legal action.

"I have reports in hand from the war crimes unit and I am expecting more," Rock told The CJN last week.

Although he would not divulge the number of cases on his desk, he said the files contain recommendations as to whether to proceed with criminal charges, whether to refer cases to the Citizenship Ministry for denaturalization or whether to drop them entirely.

The cases represent work completed up to the end of March 1994, the deadline set by the previous Conservative government for the war crimes unit to report on the status of its ongoing cases.

The unit, which has been funded for another year, will continue its work for the foreseeable future, Rock said.

"I'm interested in getting them to complete their work and have it on my desk so I can do my job," the minister said. "I'm anxious to get these cases dealt with."

Rock's announcement came shortly after he met with a delegation from Canadian Jewish Congress, which in recent months had been increasingly critical of the war crimes unit's slow pace in advancing cases.

Prof. Irving Abella, president of Congress, said he and Milton Harris, chair of the organization's war crimes committee, met Rock in Toronto. Abella said he was heartened by the minister's attitude to the war crimes portfolio.

Allan Rock

It appears the minister "has lit a fire under the people in Justice" to proceed expeditiously, Abella said. "I really think the minister is committed to doing something regarding war criminals." Pointing to the aging of witnesses and suspects, Abella said "I think he knows it's his mandate and that if he doesn't go ahead, no one will."

Since the Criminal Code was amended in 1987 to allow for the prosecution in Canada of war crimes suspects, only four cases have been launched. One, involving former Hungarian gendarmerie captain Imre Finta, resulted in acquittal. Prosecutors dropped two other cases while a fourth, involving Radislav Grujicic, is under way in Windsor.

The unit's only success came in the case of Jacob Luitjens, a former University of British Columbia botany lecturer who had collaborated with Nazi forces in his native Holland. He was stripped of his citizenship for lying about his wartime activities and deported to Holland, where he is serving a jail sentence.

In Windsor meanwhile, the Grujicic case ran into snags when the 83-year-old accused man fell asleep in the prisoner's dock as the charges were being read.

His lawyer told Judge J.M. Donnelly that Grujicic had not slept well the night before.

Grujicic pleaded not guilty to charges of conspiracy, murder and kidnapping. Prosecutors allege that Grujicic conspired with German forces in Yugoslavia between June 1941 and October 1944 to kidnap communists for forced labor in Germany and to murder others.

PQ clarifies comments on Israel

By JANICE ARNOLD
and DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporters

MONTREAL —The international affairs spokesman for the Parti-Quebecois (PQ), Andre Boulerice, has stated flatly that opinions expressed by party treasurer Rita Dionne-Marsolais about Israel and about the Jews in Quebec do not reflect PQ policy.

Dionne-Marsolais characterized the Jewish state as an "aggressive country...made on the backs of the Palestinians," in an article in the March 30 Montreal Suburban. She was responding to statements about anti-Semitism made by Israeli MK Ariel Sharon during his visit to Montreal in March.

She described Israel as a nation that "built a country through war . . . Quebecers do not like war. We have quietly built Quebec over the last two centuries without taking up arms against anyone. We do not live on the backs of others."

She also said, "Palestinians were robbed of their country."

In an interview with The CJN, Dionne-Marsolais confirmed that the comments in the article were mostly accurate, but insisted they were not meant in a pejorative way.

However, officials at the Canadian-Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) and at the Canada Israel Committee-Quebec (CIC-Q) say they see no other way to interpret them.

CJC-Q director Michael Crelinsten said the comments "imply a profound misunderstanding of Israel and its history."

In a phone call to The CJN from Barcelona, Spain, Boulerice said he was surprised by Dionne-Marsolais' remarks because when she travelled to Israel last year on a CIC-Q-sponsored trip, she "came back so enthusiastic" and wrote positively about her trip in La Presse in January. She was especially supportive of those in Israel working towards peace.

Boulerice also stressed that only three people are mandated to speak about international affairs on behalf of the party: PQ leader Jaques Parizeau; Bernard Landry, chair of the national executive; and Boulerice himself.

"As soon as I come back [April 15], I will discuss this with her," he said. "Things are beautiful [between the PQ and the Jewish community] and if people want to change that they have to face me."

He said Israel provides a "model" and an "inspiration" to those seeking an independent Quebec.

Asked if Dionne-Marsolais' opinions nevertheless reflected what is said within the party, Boulerice replied, "Do Mordecai Richler's opinions reflect those of the Quebec Jewish community?"

He said Dionne-Marsolais should not have given an interview to the Suburban, a local publication he is familiar with.

He did indicate he was not a fan of Sharon, and had demonstrated against his visit to Montreal in 1983. He disapproves of Sharon's appearances here because he feels they "divide the community."

In the article, Dionne-Marsolais referred to a speech given by Sharon in Montreal, in which he said, "Anti-Semitism is spreading...all around the world. You know the day will come that people will...tell you 'we do not want you to live in Montreal, we do not want you to live in Toronto, we do not want you to live in Brooklyn.' "

Dionne-Marsolais said Sharon's remarks about anti-Semitism in North America wounded Quebecers. "We pay for Jewish schools and hospitals with our tax dollars," she added.

Boulerice commented, "Quebec has always been proud that it is the only place in the world, with Israel, where Jewish schools are subsidized by the state. And that will be part of the constitution of an independent Quebec."

Dionne-Marsolais told The CJN her comments were not intended as negative, but only that they reflected the "reality" of Israel.

Israel is an "extraordinary country, with extraordinary people," she said.

"But it is also very aggressive, and I do not mean that in a negative way.

"I'm not a person who values violence. It is obvious from the Holocaust that violence is part of the history of the Jewish people. I recognize and understand that, but I would hope that our societies have been progressing."

This does not deny the fact that Israel was "built 'on the backs of the Palestinians,' " she reiterated. "You know, there are always two sides to a coin. Those who read the book Bloodbrothers wouldn't be shocked [by my comments].

"It's a fact that the country was built through war. If they don't like war, they've been doing it a hell of a long time.

"I'm not saying you can't explain it. It's just the reality. Even with war you can build an impressive country."

Crelinsten said he was puzzled by her remarks. He said when Dionne-Marsolais referred to Quebec tax dollars paying for Jewish hospitals and schools, "she is also speaking about taxes the Jewish community pays.

"It would be most unfortunate that in referring to our tax dollars she was doing so in an exclusionary way.

"It is also our opinion that our Jewish schools and hospitals make a significant contribution to all Quebecers irrespective of their linguistic or ethnic backgrounds."

Thomas Hecht, chair of the CIC-Q, said he was "dismayed, shocked and exceptionally surprised" by Dionne-Marsolais' comments, especially in view of the positive reaction to Israel she displayed following the CIC-Q-sponsored trip.

Hecht disagreed "to the very core" with Dionne-Marsolais.

"To create symmetries between the Quebec situation and the Middle East is a wrong premise and draws wrong conclusions."

Depicting Israel as "violent" or "aggressive" demonstrates no comprehension of the "reality of history.

"These are wars Israel had to fight for its own existence," Hecht said.

The "realities" as perceived by Dionne-Marsolais, Hecht said, are not the "realities as seen by an objective observer, but by one with a special agenda that I'm not familiar with."

Sabina Citron accuses CBC of bias

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The CBC came under attack recently at hearings of the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC) for "practising a very palpable anti-Israel, pro-Arab bias which has grown incrementally over the years."

Sabina Citron, representing the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association (CHRA), charged the CBC with offering reports about the Middle East that suffer from "an absence of concern for accuracy" and from a lack of context.

Citron was speaking at CRTC hearings to determine whether CBC's television license should be renewed.

The CBC responded to its critics, including the CHRA, at the close of the hearings. Jim Byrd, vice-president of English television, read a brief statement that thanked Citron for "reminding us of the importance of maintaining high journalistic standards in all our endeavors and of the critical need to be sensitive at all times to the multicultural realities not just of Canadians, but of the global society."

Tom Curzon, senior director of media and public relations for the CBC, told The CJN that CBC reporters and editors are obliged to follow a guide "to ensure that we are fair, accurate and balanced." He said that over the long haul, CBC's coverage of issues, whether on television or radio, "ultimately is balanced."

Citron, meanwhile, maintained that the CBC suffers from a "pro-Arab tilt" requiring some "housecleaning" of staff. Furthermore, the CHRA opposes the CBC's proposal that it sell its news programming abroad. That would only spread CBC's biases to other countries, she said.

In a brief presentation to the CRTC, Citron accused the CBC of being "perverted into a tool of Arab propaganda against Israel." The CHRA is "asking for nothing more and nothing less than for accurate and responsible journalism and that the CBC accord Israel the same kind of respect and deference as any other nation."

In her address to the CRTC, Citron stated that at a time when the world is racked by two dozen conflicts and civil wars, most of which are far deadlier than those involving Israel, the CBC is continuing to focus on Israel.

Hundreds of thousands of innocents are being killed in these other conflicts "yet we hardly, if ever, hear about them," she said. "By ignoring these other tragedies the CBC is further creating a distorted image of the world around us, making the Arab-Israeli conflict appear far greater than it is."

A written brief submitted to the CRTC outlines several examples of what the CHRA claims is CBC "self-censorship by ommission:"

- it presented "a sanitized version of the intifada. . . We were not shown the masked and armed thugs and killers with fire arms, axes and knives."
- the broadcaster "never referred to . . . the incitement to hatred and violence by the Muslim mullahs in their mosques. . . nor the constant chants of 'kill the Jews' by these thugs and the 'innocent' pebble-throwing children."
- "during the Gulf War — Iraq's invasion of Kuwait — the CBC shifted the focus from Iraq to Israel in both radio and TV news and other programs."
- correspondent Paul Workman, referring to Israel's planned withdrawal from Jericho, stated that for Palestinians it is a matter of 'sovereignty'. The Sept. 13 accords refer only to limited autonomy, not sovereignty, the CHRA states.

Michael Goldbloom to be named publisher of Montreal Gazette

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

Michael Goldbloom

MONTREAL — Michael Goldbloom says he is looking forward to his new position as publisher of Montreal's only English language daily newspaper, the Gazette, with much anticipation, mixed with a smidgen of trepidation.

What is making Goldbloom a mite nervous is not the fact that at the age of 41, he will be the youngest and first Jewish publisher in the history of the 216-year-old Montreal newspaper, once closely identified with the city's Protestant English ascendancy.

Rather, he indicated in an interview with The CJN, it is the simple fact that he is taking over the newspaper's helm (succeeding David Perks, who will have served about five years) at a pivotal time in Quebec's history, with the province confronting fundamental issues that will define its future.

"It's a pretty extraordinary thing," said Goldbloom, "to be publisher at such a critical time. I hope to be able to make a contribution."

That self-effacing comment gives a clue to Goldbloom's low-key style. But it also belies the fact that his diplomatic instincts could serve the newspaper well at a period of its history beset by labor-management problems and by the declining profits and readership common to many print media.

Goldbloom, in fact, is a labor lawyer by training. But he is much better known to Quebecers as the man who co-founded and headed the province's most high-profile English-rights lobby group, Alliance Quebec, from 1981 to 1985.

Since November 1991 Goldbloom has been the president and chief administrator at the Montreal YMCA. He was previously with the law firm of Martineau Walker.

In Goldbloom's view, the fact that he is the newspaper's first Jewish publisher is not, well, all that newsworthy.

"From a broad perspective, that probably would not have been possible when my father [Dr. Victor Goldbloom] was my age," he said. Dr. Goldbloom, a prominent Montreal pediatrician, is now Canada's commissioner of official languages and was a provincial Liberal cabinet member during the 1970s.

"It is not a major moment in the life of the Jewish community, but it is a major indication, a healthy sign of how society has changed."

In Goldbloom's mind, the decision by the Gazette's parent corporation, Southam Inc., to appoint him as publisher was more a reflection of his having "deep roots" in the Montreal community as a whole. "My Jewishness," he believes, "was not a factor."

When Goldbloom takes up the reins of his new position on June 1, he will draw on his experiences both as a reporter for the Gazette and as a member of the editorial board 14 years ago.

He is the first Montreal native to be at the newspaper's helm in many a year. But Goldbloom, who is fluently bilingual, said he also needs time to settle into the job before more clearly defining what sort of "personal stamp" he might want to put on the paper or deciding how "hands on" or "hands off" he will be.

To be sure, Goldbloom, without elaborating, did say that he obviously has a "significant interest" in the Gazette's "editorial approach. If that weren't the case I wouldn't have taken the job."

In the broader sense, however, Goldbloom said he is committed to the Gazette's reflecting the sensibility and sentiments of all of Quebec society, while still serving as the "mirror" for its anglophone community.

Goldbloom is also pleased to be taking over the post at a juncture in history when English-speaking Montreal has become "more and more bilingual."

Besides Alliance Quebec and the YMCA, Goldbloom has ties with Ville-Marie Social Services (a network of social service agencies), Heritage Montreal (a group set up to preserve historical landmarks) and the Red Cross, to name just a few. He sees his new position as publisher as a continuation of his effort to take on roles of "community responsibility."

But as Gazette publisher, Goldbloom said he will also have to reconsider his affiliations, including those with Jewish community institutions.

In all likelihood, he said, he will no longer be able to serve "in a formal way," either as a member of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region's community relations committee or on the board of Federation CJA's Rapprochement Quebec.

Goldbloom considers the Gazette as "one of Canada's best" newspapers, and editor-in-chief Joan Fraser as "one of the best" in the business. But there is always room for improvement, he said.

"I've been reading the Gazette for 35 years, and have always been a fan."

How did father Victor react to his appointment?

"He was very encouraging," says son Michael. "He felt it was a unique opportunity and an important responsibility to assume."

Manitoba allocates $24 million to province's independent schools

Grants remain frozen

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Although the province has frozen grants to Manitoba's private schools at 63.5 per cent of public funding for the third year in a row, the government has made up for it to some degree by making available to the independent schools $24 million for next year, for gifted education, counselling, resource and remedial needs — with no strings attached.

"Previously, we have had to provide documentation when applying for funds in these areas," explains Dr. Arnold Carmel, superintendent of the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education (WJBE). "The Manitoba Federation of Independent Schools has been arguing for three or four years that this isn't fair. We seem to have finally convinced the government that we should be treated in this regard the same way the public schools are treated. Now we will no longer have to justify our requests and we will be able to expand our programs."

In 1990, the newly-elected Manitoba Conservative majority government vowed to raise public funding for private schools to 80 per cent of public school funding per pupil. By 1994-95, the figure was supposed to reach 71 per cent.

"We understand the government's financial dilemma," says Carmel. "We are prepared to accept the continuing freeze, on the understanding that the government will live up to its commitment at some point when the economy is improved. We were only arguing that we should be treated as equitably as the public sector."

For 1994-95, the WJBE is projecting an enrolment of 840 students in its two elementary and one high school. That is an increase of 14 per cent since 1991. Carmel reports that enrolment has increased each year since 1991, mainly because a growing number of students are transferring from the Hebrew bilingual public elementary school programs to the WJBE's Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

KUNOWITZ

Hugh Kline enquires about the origin of his late mother's surname Kunowitz.

There are actually four villages in Poland called Kunowo. Since the family originally came from Bochnia, I would infer that the Kunowo which gave his mother her surname was the one in south Poland (Leszczynskie).

TZARFATI — ASHKENAZI

Margherita Sarfati is described as the Jewish mistress of Benito Musselini, whose influence brought him to power in Fascist Italy.

Tzorfat is the Hebrew name of France. Ashkenazi is the Hebrew name of Germany.

In Yiddish, Frenchman would be Frantzos and German would be Deutsch.

We mourn the passing of
whose love for Yiddish, vision and generosity led to the introduction of Yiddish in the elementary schools of Israel, the launching of Yiddish teacher training courses at Tel Aviv University and contributed to the establishment of the Yiddish Teachers Seminary in Moscow.
His was a life blessed with longevity and uplifted by dedication to Yiddish education in Toronto and to the cause of rebuilding Israel.
We extend our condolences to his wife Ann, daughter Pearl Banks, sons Irving & Melvin, and to their families.

WANTED: Jewish roots

Hidden Children seek out their past

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

On April 7, Israel marked Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Day. Among those who survived the Holocaust are tens of thousands of Jewish children who were hidden in Europe during the war. Last year, many of them, now in their 50s and 60s, met in Jerusalem for the Second International Gathering of the Hidden Children, organized by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai Brith. CJN's Israel correspondent, Leora Frucht, spoke to three hidden children, who have since built new lives for themselves in Canada.

JERUSALEM — The notice on the bulletin board at the Jerusalem Convention centre was concise: "I'm looking for my sister, Tamara Kron, age four. Disappeared in the kinder action in November 1943 in the Shauler ghetto in Lithuania."

It was one of hundreds of such notices, posted next to black and white photographs torn out of family albums. Fragments of another life. Tiny vestiges of hope.

This haunting, relentless search for the past is one feature that united many of the Jews from all over the world who gathered in Jerusalem last year for the Second International Gathering of the Hidden Child. It was not the only thing they had in common. Children who were hidden during the war — some in convents, others in farmhouses, and still others by scrounging in the woods — have particular experiences that set them apart from other Holocaust survivors. Only in recent years have these survivors, now in their 50s and 60s, begun to realize the impact that "being hidden" has had on their lives.

Ruth Kron Sigal, a Vancouver psychologist, was 7 years old when she saw her younger sister, Tamara, for the last time. "The image is etched in my mind: she was standing there, arms outstretched, crying, 'why are you leaving me?' as they put her in the truck with the rest of the children." Ruth was spared. She was the only child from her ghetto in Lithuania to survive the kinder action — the German liquidation of the children of the ghettos. To this day, she continues to search for the sister she lost, putting up notices like the one on the bulletin board at the Jerusalem Convention Centre.

"I never miss a chance to search. The illogical part of me still believes maybe . . ."

After Ruth's miraculous rescue — due to the intervention of her uncle and a Gestapo commander who owed him a favor — she was smuggled out of the Shauler ghetto and taken in by a Lithuanian family. She spent four months hidden in a closet. The mother would sit outside the closet door, teaching Ruth Lithuanian. When she had mastered the language, she was let out of the closet. Her hair was dyed blonde, and she was introduced as Irene Rogowsky, a relative of Ona and Antonus Rogowsky, her care-takers. The couple hid 14 other Jews in the lofts of their farm. But Ruth was able to roam about freely, posing as — and gradually becoming — a member of the family.

By this time, Ruth assumed her real parents were dead. When her mother arrived a year later to retrieve her, Ruth did not want to go. "I had been taught to fear any connection to Jews. To me, being a Jew meant death." It took Ruth's parents several months to convince her to return. She did so on two conditions: her parents had to promise they would never speak Yiddish again and that they would take her to church every Sunday.

Ruth's terror of being associated with Judaism and her ambivalent identity are burdens that many hidden children bear. If Jewish adults survived by temporarily suppressing their identity, they at least knew who they were. But for young children with malleable identities it was another story.

Abraham Foxman, national director of B'nai Brith's Anti-Defamation League, says he could easily have become a Catholic priest in Poland. Hidden and baptised by his Polish Catholic nursemaid, Foxman couldn't relinquish his Christian identity even after he was re-united with his parents. "When I passed a priest on Simchat Torah, I would kiss his hand and cross myself," he recounts.

For more than a year after her parents' return, Ruth continued going to church. Even after she stopped, the deeply entrenched fear of being Jewish continued to exert a hold on her life. The 57-year-old psychologist, who heads the University of British Columbia's Women's Resource centre, takes two days off every Yom Kippur. But until recently, she never dared tell her colleagues what the vacation was for. "I continued hiding long after the war. Many of us are still hiding."

If Ruth eventually recovered her identity, there are untold numbers of Jews who to this day do not know who they are — children who were younger than Ruth when they were hidden, children whose real parents never came back. Lillian Nemetz, a Vancouver poet, believes that her sister may be one of them.

Nemetz, who was born Jagna Boraks, was nine years old when she and her younger sister, Basia were smuggled out of the Warsaw ghetto and each placed in the home of a different Polish Catholic family. After about 18 months, Lillian's parents returned to get her. But when they went to retrieve their younger daughter, they were told that someone had informed on her. She was dead.

"We never got any proof that she was dead. But we searched for her after the war, and never found her," recalls Lillian, who still carries a photograph of her small, blonde sister, Basia.

Several things about Basia's disappearance are puzzling. If an informer had revealed the girl's hiding place, then her Polish caretakers would also have been killed for sheltering a Jew. But they were not. Lillian speculates that the elderly couple, who were childless, may have wanted to keep Basia as their own.

In 1967, Lillian returned to Poland in search of her sister. "The caretakers — who had been childless — now had a grandchild. There were toys all around — and a young girl playing. Their stories about Basia's disappearance contradicted one another. I know they weren't telling me the truth. But I couldn't solve the puzzle."

Lillian hopes to make one more trip to Poland. But she knows that she will never get her sister back. The little girl in the photograph is long gone. "Even if Basia is alive, she will have no idea — no memory — of who she is."

When Lillian's father sent her off with a small suitcase and false papers, he was doing everything he could just to keep her alive. But for the young child left to fend on her own, there was a terrible sense of abandonment. It is another scar that many hidden children bear.

"It's amazing how that sense of abandonment repeats itself throughout one's life," says Lillian, who runs a child survivors group in Vancouver. "It's a terrible thing when you think that, after having gone through a whole lifetime of struggle to overcome that horrible, lost, rejected feeling, you find yourself alone again," says the 60-year-old poet, who is divorced. "Being torn out of your home and separated from your family causes a loneliness that lasts a lifetime. And it is much more pronounced in old age. We child survivors are getting to that age."

Hidden children were above all robbed of their childhood. Ines Vromen Dreyfus was a 10-year-old girl living in Strasbourg, France when the war began. On her last family vacation in 1942, she was lounging near the hotel swimming pool when she overheard a conversation between her parents and other adults. " 'What do they do with the children?' someone asked. 'Bruler vif. Burn them alive,' " was the response.

Soon after, Ines — today, a resident of Ottawa — was hiding in an abandoned farm, together with her mother and grandmother. "I had become so strong from chopping trees that I was like a farm man," she recalls. One day, while in the basement of the farmhouse, she looked up to see the black boots of a German soldier next to the window. "It was nearly the end of the war, and now we were going to die. I felt such anger in me. With perfect coolness, I raised the axe. I began to aim. I thought only of kiling. Suddenly I felt a hand on my wrist. 'It's not worth it,' said my mother. 'There are three of them.' "

The most haunting part of the experience for Ines came later when she saw the face of the German. "He was nothing like the image I had of an SS man. He was so young, nearly the same age as me. And he had exactly the same color eyes as mine: blue-grey. We could have been neighbors in Strasbourg. We could have been playmates."

The most powerful legacy of the hidden children is the legacy of silence.

When Lillian Nemetz was reunited with her parents, they spent six months living under false identities, posing as Christians. "I was so afraid I'd make a mistake that I didn't speak for six months," she recalls.

Ruth Kron Sigal was posing as a Lithuanian child when she saw her cousins taken away in a transport. The truck passed right by her house. She saw their faces. They saw her. No one uttered a word.

"We learned not to cry, not to complain," says Dr. Robert Krell, a Vancouver psychiatry professor, who was hidden by a Dutch family for three years. "When I broke a Christmas tree ornament," recalls Krell, "I was sure I'd be sent away. We learned that silent children are prized. So we retreated into silence," says the founder of the Vancouver Holocaust Centre Society for Education and Remembrance.

It is a legacy that is not easily discarded.

"My first reaction to being interviewed now was fear," says Ruth Kron Sigal. "I don't want them to know where I live. They can find me. I know it's not rational — these fears, this mistrust. It's a sense that when you're least expecting trouble, that is when it will come. That's when they will find you."

"Silence is the vocabulary of the child survivor," explains Krell. "Silence is the comforter with which we wrap ourselves."

But despite the fear, despite the comfort of silence, hidden children are at long last beginning to talk about their experiences. "I know I've got to speak up," says Ruth, "because of the Holocaust deniers, because of the new generations that need to be told.

"I have recounted my story to high school students. I have allowed it to be viodeotaped. Despite my reluctance," says Ruth, "I have forced myself to speak."

That is, to a large degree, what conferences like the Jerusalem gathering of hidden children are about: breaking a 50-year-old silence and coming out of hiding.

Exhibit captures Holocaust's essence

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — The Art of Memory: Holocaust Memorials in History is the first exhibition to examine the aims and consequences of memorialization — shaping public memory of the Holocaust in the United States, Israel and Europe.

This new exhibit at the Jewish Museum in Manhattan continues until July 31. Over 200 images and objects are on display, including photographs, videos and multimedia presentations. Sculptural and architectural models, and designs for existing and planned Holocaust memorials illuminate their many dimensions, potentials and limitations.

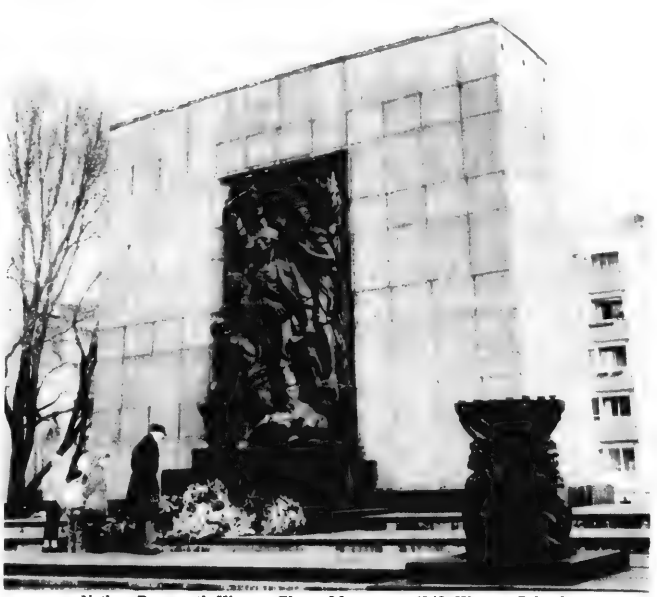
"In the last decade there has been an outpouring of books, films and visual art on the subject, as well as special exhibitions, remembrance ceremonies and reunions of survivors. On a larger scale, the Holocaust has inspired the planning and building of many public monuments and insitutions. It is these works and the process of their creation which provoked the staff and Board of Trustees of the Jewish Museum to address 'the creation of public memory,' as James E. Young, one of the organizers and guest curator has called it," says exhibition director Joan Rosenbaum.

Young, a professor of English and Judaic studies at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst and author of Texture of Memory: Holocaust Memorials & Meanings, stresses the essence of the show.

"Depending on where these memorials are constructed and by whom, these sites recall the past according to a variety of national myths, ideals and political needs."

In Israel, Jewish resisters are immortalized for their heroism, and the memory of the Holocaust has been shaped by the ideals of the state. Thus a statue of Mordechai Anielewicz, leader of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, has become as much a symbol of the fight for Israeli independence as it is a Holocaust memorial.

Conversely, America sees itself as a safe haven from oppression. Nathan Rapoport's 15-foot bronze sculpture Liberation stands in Liberty State Park in New Jersey, a compelling tribute to GI's, and depicts an American soldier carrying a survivor out of a concentration camp. Rapoport dedicated his heart and his vast creative energies to "memorializing" Holocaust sculpture: His work entitled Jacob Wrestling With The Angel can be seen in front of the North Branch of the Jewish Community Centre in Toronto.



Nathan Rapoport's Warsaw Ghetto Monument, 1948, Warsaw, Poland.

Rapoport is also represented by his famous sculpture of the Warsaw Ghetto Monument, possibly the most widely known of all the world's Holocaust memorials. Asked about his choice of figurative over abstract sculpture, Rapoport responded plaintively, "Could I have made a rock with a hole in it and said 'Voila, the heroism of the Jews'?"

Reproductions of memorials elsewhere include Wiktor Tolkin's huge, forbidding monument which towers over Majdanek in Lublin, Poland and is the first memorial and museum. Holocaust memory is found also in a miniature model of a vast field of 17,000 granite shards recalling 850,000 Jews who perished at Treblinka. Also present is an architectural design of the U.S. Memorial Museum in Washington.

At the end of the exhibition visitors are invited to view a 30-minute video presentation, Holocaust Memorials Visited and Revisited. Author Primo Levi is among the survivors who offer personal reflections.

"Maybe a very great sculptor — a Michelangelo or Rodin — might have been up to the task," lamented sculptor Henry Moore, head of the international design jury for the competiton. Initially (later compromise was achieved), none of the submissions satisfied the criteria of all the jury of artists, architect, critics and the most critical judges of all — survivors.

The Art of Memory: Holocaust Memorials in History can be seen at the Jewish Museum, 1109 Fifth Ave. at 92nd Street. It then travels to Berlin and Munich.

JEWISH WOMEN'S FEDERATION TOGETHER 1993 UJA WOMEN'S CAMPAIGN

JEWISH WOMEN'S FEDERATION IS A DEPARTMENT OF THE JEWISH FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO

Common Destiny Energizes New Leaders

Jewish strength through our common bond. That's the force motivating the new leaders of UJA's Women's Campaign and Jewish Women's Federation (JWF).

At their recent installation, both UJA's Barbara Bank and JWF's Glennie Lindenberg recounted personal journeys through their Jewish heritage that influenced their lives and their leadership philosophies.

The U.S.-born Bank described her early history in Boston as the "story of my generation."

"We were the idealistic children of the late 1960's, who fought passionately for civil rights and the end of the Vietnam War, but never felt closely connected to our cultural roots," she said. "I had always identified myself first as an American, then as a Jew."

Bank's father had told her in small fragments about his experience as a U.S. soldier in Europe during World War II, leaving out his association with Holocaust victims. However, before Bank left for her third year of college in Denmark, her father "revealed for the first time the sorrow he had felt as a medic giving care to the survivors of Dachau."

"And many months later, as a tribute to my father, as if guided by a powerful hand, I walked the tear-soaked grounds of the Dachau concentration camp and shared his grief."

Bank believes that despite diverse pasts experienced by Toronto Jewry, "the future we have chosen to shape is our common bond." Because of her personal history, she feels it is crucial to reach community members who are "disconnected and disinterested."

For Glennie Lindenberg, a trip to Poland with her husband, Nathan, her brother and her parents was a pivotal event.

They had travelled to visit the birthplace of both her parents and her in-laws.

The family search found its way to the little village where Lindenberg's mother was raised; to the town from which her father had been forcibly removed by the Nazis; to the cemetery where her father-in-law's family was buried.

"Using a photograph from my father-in-law that was taken after the war," she said, "we found, after an hour's search, the monument of his family. We could make out the words 'Israel Lindenberg', my father-in-law's father, after whom our son Ira was named."

As a result of the trip, Lindenberg now sees a profound "sense of continuity between past, present and future." She considers her voyage of discovery "a personal metaphor for the responsibilities of leadership from generation to generation."

Lindenberg assured installation participants that JWF would continue to lobby for issues of concern to women and the promotion of more women to senior community roles.

The influential Shoshana Cardin, guest speaker at the installation, advised Jewish women to make sure a Jewish perspective accompanies every leadership decision they make. "For me, being a Jew is primary," she emphasized.

Cardin also evoked biblical imagery to describe the special responsibilities of women, comparing them to the ancient prophets who had no problem petitioning G-d for both family and community needs. The Jewish community, she said, is everyone's "extended family," and the definition of Jewish needs should be all encompassing.

Cardin chairs the Centre for Learning and Leadership (CLAL) in the United States, is U.S. national vice-chairperson of UJA, and formerly led the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations.

Jewish Women's Federation, a department of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, is the umbrella organization for 50 Jewish women's volunteer organizations in Toronto. JWF brings together women from a broad spectrum of ideological backgrounds to network, to develop leadership skills, to address important social and political action issues and to help integrate new Canadians into the Jewish community.

JWF is open to all Jewish women's organizations which provide services to the local Jewish community and/or Israel, have been in existence for two years, manifest a clear organizational structure and support the United Jewish Appeal Campaign. If your organization would like to join the JWF "umbrella," please call Lisa Morrison at (416) 631-5704.

Mideast tensions no reason not to visit Israel: Ben-Tzur

Expects community to support country

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When IRA missiles recently fell upon London airports, causing temporary shutdowns, did tourism to England dramatically fall off? When a deranged gunman recently shot up a Long Island commuter train, did masses of travellers suddenly bypass New York? Are airports empty and foreign licence-plates rare in Los Angeles, Miami and other U.S. cities after well-publicized episodes of violence?

Ruth Ben-Tzur, Israel's consul for tourism in Canada, asks these questions to make a point. "I don't see anybody cancelling their holidays to these places," she told The CJN recently during an interview in her Toronto office. "If you still travel to Europe, Los Angeles, Florida or Manhattan, then you should still go to Israel. Why are we treated as though there's a double standard? Is there one kind of danger here and one kind of danger there?"

Born in Jerusalem, Ben-Tzur is a proud and passionate protector of Israel's reputation. A former public relations advisor to Moshe Dayan, she has served as director of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Canada since July 1992. Promoting travel to the Jewish state is her key function.

After a disastrous Gulf War and more than four years of intifadah, Israeli tourism officials have been hoping the peace process would help make 1994 a bumper year for tourism. But Ben-Tzur ruefully admitted that travel to Israel has declined marginally after late February's tragic Hebron massacre. Even a couple of Jewish groups in Canada have postponed their trips, she said.

"I don't find any reason for that. There's no logic in it. There wasn't one location in their itineraries that had anything to do with the areas you see on television," she said, praising other Jewish groups here that have remained steadfast in their travel plans. (These include groups from Na'amat, and Toronto's Beth Emeth, Beth David, Adath Israel and Montreal's Beit Ora synagogues.)

"I expect the Jewish community to demonstrate their support of Israel. To make such a request, it's not like I'm asking anybody to sacrifice anything. All I want is for people to come and have fun, not to suffer. If we ever needed the support and solidarity of the Jewish community, it's now."

In the echo chamber of the media, Hebron's tragic gunshots are still loudly reverberating. The spate of television images and newspaper headlines have magnified the problems of the Jewish state and produced the misperception that it is unsafe to travel anywhere in Israel, Ben-Tzur said. But, she continued, all the actual trouble spots lie entirely within the Gaza Strip and the West Bank — "and since when do any Canadians go to see the Gaza Strip?

"Everyone knows the media is not so accurate when it comes to Israel. I expect Jewish people to read between the lines and understand that what the media says is one thing and the reality is something else."

During the Gulf War, Ben-Tzur said, her American relatives phoned one day and nearly panicked when no one answered; she had taken her children to the park. Later, they beseeched her and her husband to take their children and leave. "I told them, 'You go on crying at what you see on the television, and I'll go on having fun in my country.' What they were seeing on television had nothing to do with our daily life."

Ruth Ben-Tzur

A short article that appeared on the front page of The CJN of March 17, entitled Canada issues travel advisory, was inaccurate and misleading, according to Ben-Tzur. "There was no travel advisory (for Israel) in March," she said. "There was a travel advisory for only a few days in February, but then it became an ordinary travel information report."

However, Lily Campbell-Ferreira, a spokesperson for the Department of Foreign Affairs in Ottawa, said no travel advisory for Israel was issued — neither in February nor in March. Such advisories are not "issued" at all, she said, merely kept on hand for the benefit of travellers who make use of the department's toll-free travel information service (1-800-267-6788).

Normally reserved for major disturbances, a travel advisory for Hebron, East Jerusalem and a few other areas of Israel and the "Occupied Territories" was in effect for several days but was downgraded to a routine travel information report early in March, Campbell-Ferreira recollected.

The department's current travel information report recommends that "Canadians defer travel for the time being to Israeli-occupied areas in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, including East Jerusalem." By making no recommendation regarding travel within Israel proper, the report implies that the Department of Foreign Affairs Canada regards all areas within the pre-1967 borders as safe for tourists.

And that is precisely Ruth Ben-Tzur's point. "If I felt it was even slightly dangerous for tourists, I wouldn't dare sit here and tell you how safe it is," she said. "I can guarantee with 100 per cent certainty that Israel is as safe today as at any other time.

"We shouldn't let an unfortunate event cause us to delay our travel plans. We don't have to say, 'Next year in Jerusalem.' It should be 'This year in Jerusalem.' "

Reform in Canada debates outreach proposals

Canada, and Toronto in particular, has always been more traditionalist in their approach to Reform, although Rabbi Stroh does not foresee a U.S.-Canada schism.

As far as backing up calls for outreach with money is concerned, "it's not unheard of in history. Throughout the Talmudic period, Judaism was a missionizing religion. It's Rabbi Schindler's belief that Judaism has something to say; that it's not a private club."

But reaching out to Christians could cause a backlash, Rabbi Stroh warns.

"There's been a gentleman's agreement that mainstream Christians do not target Jews [for conversion]. This [proposal] could mean open season for Christians to go after Jews."

As for the $5 million endowment, "let's also have $5 million for Torah study. I want the Reform movement to be as concerned about being Jewish as we are about outreach and social action."

The Chicago group hopes to have some policy in place when the Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR), the movement's rabbinical arm, holds its annual convention there starting May 29.

But already, Rabbi Schindler's proposals have generated "spontaneous negative" reactions from rabbis and congregational leaders, most of them in Toronto, said Rabbi Edward Goldfarb of Shaarei-Beth El Congregation in Oakville, Ont. and a member of the Chicago working group.

"I haven't done a poll but the vast majority, if not the entire [Chicago] group, appears opposed. And the numbers in opposition [in the general community] appear larger than anyone thought."

As Rabbi Goldfarb sees it, Canadian rabbis stand to the right of their U.S. counterparts, in a movement "that seems to be going toward the left."

Another member of the Chicago group, Rabbi Dow Marmur of Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple, says flatly that Rabbi Schindler's views "are decidedly not shared by the Reform congregations of Toronto."

The Canadian Reform rabbinate's senior voice, Rabbi Gunther Plaut of Toronto, may have summarized the fears of his colleagues in a recent paper:

"If we go the way many of our congregations ... are bent on going," he warned, "Reform Judaism 50 years from now will be unrecognizable, if in fact, it will exist altogether.

"We are a particular religious people ... We gladly accept willing converts and are sensitive, courteous and understanding to others in our midst. But we have a right and duty to preserve our particularity."

In the minority on all this, it seems, is Rabbi Leigh Lerner of Montreal's Temple Emanu-El Beth Sholom, who asked in his congregation's bulletin recently, "Have you ever seen the face of a non-Jewish father at a bris when the mohel takes the baby for circumcision and acts as if the father doesn't exist?

"I don't see how we can avoid involving non-Jews in synagogue life to some extent. Frankly, we should want to do so, for the sake of their desire to help us have a future, for the sake of our own future."

Hebron mosque guards say Goldstein acted alone

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Jewish settler Baruch Goldstein acted alone when he killed 30 Palestinians at a Hebron mosque, three Palestinian guards said on the last day of hearings at the government's commission of inquiry.

The guards gave their testimony last Sunday before the Shamgar Commission investigating the Feb. 25 mosque killings.

The guards had initially refused to testify before an Israeli panel, and only did so after they had been subpoenaed to appear before the commission.

The three testified that Goldstein, a Kiryat Arba settler well known to them, had carried out the murders single-handedly.

Their testimony contradicted that of other Palestinians who told the commission Goldstein had not acted alone.

A preliminary inquiry by the Israeli Army reached the conclusion that Goldstein did not have an accomplice.

"He was alone. There was nobody else with him," one of the guards, Ismail Hashlamon, told the commission.

Earlier actions

He also told the panel that, to his knowledge, Goldstein had not taken part in any earlier actions on the part of the settlers that he described as being intended to provoke Palestinians at the Hebron mosque.

Hashlamon said he was surprised that Goldstein had committed the killings, saying he would never have expected it of him.

Goldstein's widow, Miriam, appearing before the commission earlier this month, said her husband's actions on the morning of Feb. 25 were still a source of confusion to her.

She had originally refused to testify, but agreed to appear on the condition that she speak before a closed session.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin also testified in a closed session of the commission, most of whose sessions were aired on Israeli television.

The transcript of Miriam Goldstein's testimony, released last Friday, indicated that she had no idea of what pushed her husband to commit the mass killings.

"It's still an enigma for me. That's the truth. I've been over and over it, and I can't arrive at an answer," she stated.

She indicated her husband had often complained that the Israeli Army was not doing enough to protect settlers in the territories from attacks by Palestinians.

Commission winds up

"He always complained about the helplessness of the Israeli government, of the Army, of the police — that they don't do their jobs properly and that we (the settlers) are abandoned," she told the commission.

She also testified that she had heard from others that her husband had been at the Tomb of the Patriarchs, a site holy to Jews and Muslims alike, on the evening before the killings.

There had been a confrontation between Jewish and Muslim worshipers that evening, she said, adding that he had left because of the unpleasantness.

Previous witnesses had denied Goldstein was present on that occasion.

The Shamgar Commission — which includes two Supreme Court justices, a professor, a former Army chief of staff and a Palestinian judge — will now retire for several weeks to consider the testimony.

In the coming weeks, the commission may warn some of those who have testified that they may have incriminated themselves and should prepare for potential criminal prosecutions.

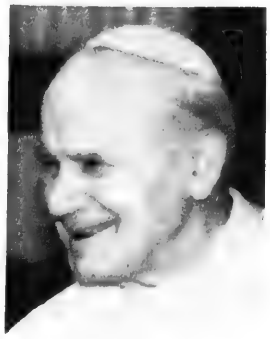
Vatican hosts concert recalling Yom Hashoah

Jewish Telegraphic Agency



Pope John Paul II

VATICAN CITY — Highlighting the Roman Catholic Church's commitment to the fight against renewed anti-Semitism, Pope John Paul II joined with Holocaust survivors — including several from Canada — at a concert last week commemorating the Shoah.

On the eve of Yom Hashoah, thousands gathered in the Vatican's Paul VI auditorium to hear the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra of London pay tribute to the six-million Jewish victims of World War II.

The concert marked the first time in the nearly 50 years since the end of the war that the Vatican has officially commemorated the Holocaust.

It followed the establishment in December of diplomatic ties between the Holy See and Israel.

The 7,500 guests included the Chief Rabbi of Rome, Elio Toaff; Avi Pazner, Israel's ambassador to Rome; Italian President Oscar Luigi Scalfaro; and representatives of Catholic and Jewish groups from around the world.

Several Holocaust survivors from Canada, and their spouses, were in attendance.

The Vatican provided a kosher lunch.

Survivors from 12 nations wore special scarves marked with the letter "J" to identify themselves.

In a meeting with about 100 survivors and their families before the concert, the Pope expressed hope that listening to music together would confirm the shared resolve of Catholics and Jews "to consolidate the good relations between our two communities so that, with the help of Almighty God, we can work together to prevent the repetition of such heinous evil."

American Jewish conductor Gilbert Levine led the Royal Philharmonic in Max Bruch's setting of the Yom Kippur prayer Kol Nidrei, with cellist Lynn Harrell as soloist. The orchestral also played the Adagio from Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The Cappella Giulia Choir of St. Peter's Basilica sang a piece for Psalm 92 in Hebrew that Franz Schubert composed for the inauguration of a new synagogue in Vienna in 1826.

Oscar-winning actor Richard Dreyfuss narrated parts of Leonard Bernstein's Kaddish, a symphony incorporating the Jewish prayer for the dead.

The program also included selections from Bernstein's Chichester Psalms in Hebrew, with Gregory Daniel Rodriguez as soloist.

The concert opened with a brief ceremony in which Holocaust survivors lit six candles in memory of those who perished.

Following the performance, the Pope addressed the crowd, calling for a moment of silence to "hear the voices of those who say 'do not forget us.' "

The concert, which was broadcast live on European television and will be shown on public television in the United States, was the brainchild of conductor Levine, a Long Island native whose mother-in-law survived Auschwitz.

Levine is conductor laureate of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Krakow and acts as one of the Pope's musical advisers.

In 1988, Levine conducted the Krakow Philharmonic in a concert marking Pope John Paul's first 10 years in office. He also conducted the 1993 Vatican concert in Denver.

Two years ago, Levine suggested the idea of a concert commemorating the Holocaust to the Pope, who then offered to hold it at the Vatican.

Funding for the concert came from both Catholic and Jewish sources, including $50,000 donated by Holocaust survivors.

In the meeting with survivors, the Pope stressed his commitment to Jewish issues and warned against new waves of anti-Semitism.

"It is not enough that we remember; for in our own day, regrettably, there are many new manifestations of the anti-Semitism, xenophobia and racial hatred which were the seeds of those unspeakable crimes," he told the survivors.

"History cannot permit all that to happen again," he said.

The Polish-born Pope recalled that he had made pilgrimages to Auschwitz and Dachau as a young man and returned to Auschwitz on his first trip to Poland after his election as Pope in 1979.

Rabbi A. James Rudin, interreligious affairs director of the American Jewish Committee, said he believed that the 73-year-old Pope has a special understanding of the Shoah because he lived through World War II in occupied Poland.

"I think what's important here is that we have a commitment from this Pope that the building of positive Catholic-Jewish relations is central to church teaching," he said.

He said that the concert "sends a signal to the whole world, particularly to people who are denying that the Holocaust ever happened."

Rudin, who helped organize the concert, called the event a "milestone."

"This is one more of the Pope's building blocks in improving Catholic-Jewish relations," Rudin said.

Choosing Village Park Was A Family Decision

▲ Srul, Elaine, Bubby, Earl and Daniel Glick (owner of Village Park)

When we acquired Village Park we never imagined our own mother would move in. But after our father passed away we knew our mother couldn't live alone anymore. She needed round-the-clock supervision and nursing assistance. So we had a family meeting and decided to bring mom to Village Park. The nursing staff are wonderful and friendly, and the care is customized so each resident's needs are met. We're glad mother's at Village Park, and she's happy here. That's the most important thing.

Territories closed following terror attack

Last week, the Hamas movement said it would step up terror attacks against Israel and turn the Independence Day celebration into a period of mourning.

To counter potential economic problems Israelis may face because of the closure of the territories, Agriculture Minister Yaacov Tsur and the director general of the Prime Minister's Office, Shimon Sheves, are to work out a scheme that will mobilize thousands of Israeli high school students and army personnel to help with the harvest.

Government subsidies that would increase wages may also encourage Israelis to return to agricultural work.

Some of the shortfall in the labor force is to be met by permitting the entry into Israel of some 18,000 foreign workers, mostly from Thailand.

Some 15,000 of them will be employed in the building trades, and the rest in agriculture.

An historic first: UN denounces anti-Israel attack

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

UNITED NATIONS — For perhaps the first time since 1948, a terrorist attack against Israel has been denounced at the United Nations.

The UN secretary-general and the president of the Security Council last week condemned the April 6 suicide bombing of a bus in Afula, which killed eight Israelis and injured many more.

"The members of the Security Council view with shock and outrage the attack on Israeli civilians on a passenger bus in the town of Afula on April 6, 1994," said New Zealand Ambassador Colin Keating, who holds the rotating presidency of the Security Council.

"The members condemn this act of terror and extend sincere condolences to the wounded and the families of those who lost their lives," he said.

Statements from the council president enable the council to make its views known without convening the council or issuing binding resolutions.

Israeli Ambassador Gad Yaacobi specifically requested that the council not convene.

Last month, the council met to condemn the murders of worshippers in a Hebron mosque, which led to a resolution calling for foreign observers in the West Bank city.

In a letter to the secretary-general asking for condemnation of the killings, Yaacobi explained that the peace process is best advanced by the parties involved.

An Israeli official at the United Nations said the council president's statement fell short of general protocol. Instead of being prepared for publication as an official UN document, as is usually the case, Keating simply read remarks without entering them into the official record.

Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali's remarks came in an official statement by his spokesman, which said he "strongly condemns this act of violence" and extended condolences.

His remarks also expressed the hope "that this outrageous incident will not be permitted to impede the ongoing negotiations between the government of Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization."

The UN's denunciations of Arab terror against Jews are thought to be the first in more than four decades.

"As far as our long memory goes," said the Israeli official, "we remember that the Security Council did condemn such attacks — in 1948."

Arab League avoids decision on boycott

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — American Jewish groups are calling on the Clinton administration to take the League of Arab States to task for refusing to consider ending the economic boycott against Israel at its meeting late last month.

The National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council and the Anti-Defamation League each expressed disappointment at what they called a broken promise by Arab League officials to discuss terminating the boycott at their March 27 meeting in Cairo.

This promise was made to U.S. Commerce Secretary Ron Brown by a high-ranking Arab League official in January during Brown's trip to the Middle East.

A source at the State Department said that the administration is "disappointed" that the termination of the boycott was not discussed.

The source said the administration will continue to raise the matter with Arab governments.

'Violates commitments'

At its March 27 meeting, the Arab League's council of foreign ministers agreed not to reach a final decision on lifting the boycott.

Qatar, Oman and Kuwait had apparently been prepared to lift the ban, at least partially, following pressure from the United States and Germany.

But Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa declared that "the reasons for the imposition of this ban have not yet been removed."

He explained that the boycott is "connected with the state of war between Israel and the Arab states, and Israel's conquest of Arab lands.

"We believe the boycott should be ended (only) with the ending of the occupation of all the Arab lands that Israel has conquered," he said.

Israeli political observers believe the Arab League decision is also partially a function of Arab fears of Israel's economic and technological strength.

Crown Prince Hassan of Jordan is on record as having spoken of an "economic holocaust of the Arab world" if the boycott is lifted without firm controls being in place beforehand.

An Israeli diplomat who requested anonymity told JTA that the Israeli government "would like to see concrete steps taken by the Arab League" to end the boycott, which has been in effect since before Israel's founding in 1948.

Secretary Brown announced from Cairo during his trip in January that Arab League Secretary-General Esmat Abdel-Meguid had told him the league would consider rescinding its secondary and tertiary boycotts at its March meeting.

The secondary boycott affects companies doing business with Israel; the tertiary boycott is imposed on companies doing business with those firms.

Jewish groups have hoped since last September, when Israel and the PLO signed their autonomy blueprint at the White House, that progress would be made toward ending the boycott, which also includes a primary boycott of Israel itself.

Thus far, however, Jewish groups have been disappointed at the lack of results.

In a letter to Brown following last week's Arab League meeting, ADL's leaders wrote of their "serious concern about the failure of the Arab League to take action on ending the secondary boycott.

"The Arab League's failure to address the boycott issue violates commitments made to you and other senior Administration officials," wrote Melvin Salberg, the group's national chairman, and Abraham Foxman, ADL's national director.

More than 60 members of Congress had written to Secretary-General Meguid, seeking assurances that the boycott would be discussed at the Arab League meeting.

The March 25 letter, initiated by Rep. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) and Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.), urged the Arab League to end the secondary and tertiary boycotts at its meeting.

"Even though some Arab nations are reportedly relaxing enforcement of the boycott, the League of Arab States must send a clear signal that the boycott has been voted out of existence," read the letter, which was signed by 63 other representatives.

Arabs Side-Step Condemnation

TORONTO — The Canadian Arab Federation (CAF) last week issued a statement that stopped short of condemning the Afula suicide bomb attack which left eight Israelis dead and injured dozens of others. In a letter to CJC president Irving Abella, CAF president Farid Ayad said his organization received the news "with deep sadness. The CAF offers its condolences to the families and friends of those killed in the bombing. This loss of life is all the more tragic as Palestinian and Arab Canadians continue to await news on the long delayed implementation of the first phase of the Palestinian-Israeli Accord.

"It is our hope that continued co-operation and improved relations between CAF and Canadian Jewish Congress may support the cause of just peace in the region," the statement said.

Canadian Jewish Congress had called on the CAF to use "its good offices" and ask PLO leader Yasser Arafat to publicly denounce the attack.

BBC Slams 'Double Standard'

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) last week condemned the "silence" of the Canadian government and Arab leaders following the Afula attack.

In a statement from executive vice-president Frank Dimant and Israel affairs committee chair Sheldon Lerman, said BBC waited 24 hours for Canadian and world leaders to respond to the attack.

"We are extremely disappointed and disturbed by the silence of the Canadian government and Arab organizations thus far. We urge them to unequivocally denounce this cowardly act.

"We condemn the muted response to date and the double standard applied to violence in the Middle East. This is stark contrast to the forceful condemnation of the recent Hebron tragedy by all countries, including Israel and by Jewish organizations worldwide."

CJC, CIC Condemn Attack

OTTAWA — The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) last week issued statements condemning the Afula attack.

CIC national chair Daniel Pekarsky called on the Palestinian leadership and the international community to condemn "a heinous act of terrorism against innocent Israeli citizens, the obvious goal of which was to destroy the peace process."

Moshe Ronen, national chair of CJC's Israel affairs committee, said Congress expresses its deepest sympathies to the families of the victims, and called on supporters of the peace process to denounce the attack.

Ottawa Responds to CJC

MONTREAL — Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs has responded to Canadian Jewish Congress's concerns following the February execution in Tehran of an elderly Iranian Jew, Fayullah Makhubat.

The department last week told CJC that Canada's embassy in Tehran confirmed reports relating to the execution. Since then, the department has raised the matter twice with officials of Iran's embassy in Ottawa.

CJC says the department has assured it that Ottawa will continue to monitor human rights in Iran, especially in light of recent reports of persecution of other religious minorities.

"We are making it clear to the Iranian government that behavior of this kind amounts to its own withdrawal from the international community," Foreign Affairs Assistant Deputy Minister Marc Perron wrote to CJC's Alan Rose.

Red Tape for Ukrainian Girl

WINNIPEG — Following the intervention of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council, a 17-year-old emigree from Ukraine was allowed to join the March of the Living, which is now taking thousands of North American Jewish students to the sites of former death camps in Poland and then to Israel.

Tanya Roitman immigrated to Canada with her family three years ago from Ukraine. Not yet a Canadian citizen, she tried to get a passport from the Ukrainian embassy in Ottawa but was told she is a citizen of the Soviet Union, which no longer exists.

The council's Robert Freedman got in touch with the Department of Foreign Affairs, which arranged for the proper travel documents so Roitman could go on the trip.

Immigration Down 15 Per Cent

JERUSALEM — Immigration to Israel dropped 15 per cent in the first quarter of this year, compared to the same period in 1993.

From January to March 1994, 16,695 immigrants arrived, compared with 19,566 in the same period last year, Acting Jewish Agency Chairman Yehiel Leket said last week. A total of 13,126 olim came from the former Soviet Union during this period, down 20 per cent.

Of the 5,388 olim who arrived last month, 4,300 were from the Commonwealth of Independent States, Leket said.

In 1993, 77,000 people immigrated to Israel, according to Central Bureau of Statistics figures. Some 66,000 were from the CIS.

Meanwhile, as unrest in South Africa increases due to the upcoming elections, the agency expects some 3,500 Jews to leave that country this year. However, only about a third are likely to come to Israel, Leket said. In 1993, some 500 Jews moved to Israel from South Africa.

Belgian Nazi Dies

BRUSSELS — Leon Degrelle, an unrepentant Belgian Nazi who found haven in Spain after World War II, died in the southern Spanish city of Malaga late last month. He was 87.

Degrelle, who headed the fascist movement in Belgium from the 1930s to the end of the war, was responsible for the deportations and deaths of about 25,000 Jews in Belgium between 1941 and 1944.

In the 1930s, Degrelle created a fascist movement called Rex, which collaborated with German Nazis and succeeded in placing several members in Parliament.

Degrelle, who became an SS general, was known to have met with Adolf Hitler several times. Hitler praised Degrelle as the son he would have liked to have had.

Degrelle was condemned to death by his own country after the war, but he fled to Spain, where he found haven among the followers of fascist leader Francisco Franco. He was given Spanish citizenship, effectively removing any chance of being extradited to Belgium.

Although Belgium asked the Spanish government for his extradition several times, the Spaniards would not comply.

After the war, Degrelle denied the Holocaust had occurred. He was a magnet for gatherings of former or neo-Nazis and liked to wear Nazi uniforms in Spain.

Reunion for Dutch Survivors

TORONTO — Fifty years ago, a group of 222 Jews from Holland imprisoned in Bergen-Belsen were spared by being exchanged for German Templars then living in Palestine. The Jews reached Palestine on July 10, 1944. The anniversary of the event will be commemorated this year in Israel. Holocaust Denial Law Proposed BERLIN — In the wake of a recent ruling by Germany's highest appeals court, the country's main opposition party will propose a new law that would criminalize Holocaust denial.

The Social Democratic Party last week announced it will seek the new legislation following a recent ruling by the Federal Court of Justice, which found that denying the Holocaust was not in itself a punishable offence.

The Federation of Jewish Communities in Germany has already called for a change in the law in order to ban Holocaust denial.

Syria Stays on Drug List

WASHINGTON — Syria will remain on a U.S. list of countries not cooperating in the fight against illicit drugs, despite indications last week to the contrary.

President Bill Clinton decided to keep Syria on the list, accepting a recommendation by Secretary of State Warren Christopher.

But Christopher is said to have overruled lower-level officials in the State Department who sought to reward Syria for its cooperation in the Middle East peace process.

Malaysia Reverses Stand

KUALA LUMPUR — The government of Malaysia last week decided to overturn its ban on the film Schindler's List, but it has not yet actually approved the film for screening.

Last month, the government banned the film, calling it too sympathetic to the Jews and too critical of the Nazis.

In announcing the reversal, the deputy prime minister said the censor's reasoning had been "unacceptable." He said, "The Nazis were brutal and cruel. And the victims, be they Jews or non-Jews, were victims, and our sympathies should be with them."

Decision to set up Hebron commission ill-considered

By HILLEL C. NEUER

By the time Israeli political, military, and religious leaders had finished outdoing each other in apologizing for the Hebron massacre, everyone hoped that the peace process could finally be resuscitated, allowed to move on. Yet the ill-considered decision to set up a full-fledged, live-broadcast public commission of inquiry under Israel's chief justice — with its original focus slowly being replaced and expanded into an indictment of Israel's entire military administration — has killed any hopes of moving beyond Hebron. Instead, Israel's cabinet has only itself to blame for creating what everybody knew would become a powerful media weapon which the Arabs would repeatedly exploit to discredit the Jewish state, and hinder peace progress.

Friends of Israel find pride in pointing out, correctly, that few peoples in the world share the Israelis' hyper-moral sensitivity, which, over the years, continues to force exhausting self-examination after examination, commission after commission. The comparison is even more potent when one remembers that Israel faces numerous and constantly rearming Arab states which remain in a declared state of war, posing an ever-present existential threat to the tiny Jewish state. Can one imagine, say, the United States, during the heat of the Gulf War, beginning an open investigation which would summon and publicly interrogate top generals about their exact military policies — or with the power to subpoena George Bush?

Judicial investigations into Israel's highest echelons are by no means recent. In its early years, Israel was rocked repeatedly with inquiries into the Lavon Affair, which eventually resulted in the resignation of the defence minister and a split in the Labor party. Later, in the wake of the 1973 Yom Kippur War, the Agranat Commission ended several careers, as a nation demanded accountability for a disaster which nearly spelled its demise. The 1980s also produced their share: the Zamir Commission, which scrutinized the domestic intelligence apparatus as never before, and the Kahan commission, which looked into possible Israeli negligence regarding the massacre by Lebanese Phalangists at the Sabra and Chatilla Palestinian refugee camps.

While it is true that the current Hebron commission is very much a product of domestic demand, it was also in large part conceived by the Israeli government — along with prisoner releases and other concessions — as a key overture in its political response to the international outcry, as a significant demonstration of good faith.

Now it is being reported that Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin himself opposed the creation of the commission, and some analysts are beginning to examine the motivations of those ministers who pressed for it loudest, with one theory suggesting a plan by the coalition's left to weaken Rabin — by implicating him either personally or by extension as the defence minister — thus effecting a policy shift to the left.

To be sure, none of this has been substantiated; the only thing which is certain is that Israel continues to suffer serious damage, as new "revelations" continue to headline the international print and electronic media, further distorting an already skewed picture of Israel and the Middle East.

For example, it is suddenly a major story that the Israel Defence Force (IDF) operates under different regulations in its relations with Israeli Jews than in its dealings with Palestinian Arabs of Judea and Samaria (the West Bank), who have been for years waging a violent uprising against Israel.

Context and history get buried beneath this media stampede, particularly the plain truth that Arabs in "Israel-proper" enjoy total civil, political and religious rights, with the irony that they are the region's only Arabs who can vote in completely free and fair elections.

Also forgotten or ignored are the tragic murders, since September alone, of three dozen Israelis by Palestinian terrorists. (We would probably be wiser not to hold our breath waiting for the PLO to begin its investigation into routine Arab violence against Jews, nor even for leader Yasser Arafat to issue so much as a verbal condemnation.) Unfortunately, by focusing our attention on one isolated act of Jewish terrorism, the commission — though unintentionally — effectively gives credence to the PLO-created image of Arabs as the victims, and not perpetrators, of civilian-targeted violence in the territories.

Israelis know that there were other options. The army just this year capably conducted a full, major investigation into a tragic training mishap, with lessons learned and officers punished. If, in determining what failed at Hebron, one nevertheless felt uneasy about having an army investigate itself, it would have been possible to incorporate civilian supervision. Alternatively, one could easily have kept the existing judicial board — along with complete publication and disclosure of the findings — yet without televising the entire proceeding, thus preventing it from becoming a circus.

Finally, one wonders, if the Arabs say they have nothing but contempt for the commission, and if its ultimate effect is to deepen, not defuse, the crisis for Israel — and consequently the peace process as a whole — what is being achieved?

How can Israel handle Jewish and Arab extremists?

By ALON BEN-MEIR

Israel, as a democracy with a determined government, can effectively neutralize the few hundred activist members of Kach and Kahane Chai, organizations that have been outlawed and branded as terrorist.

The more daunting problem that faces Israelis and Palestinians is how to handle Gush Emunim (the Block of the Faithful) and the Islamic resistance movement Hamas, two powerful organizations which diametrically and violently oppose each other. Each is committed to denial of the other's right to the land and to derailment of the peace negotiations by any means — including force — to secure exclusive sovereignty over the entire land.

The central issue in this conflict is the future status of the Israeli settlements in the West Bank. Israel and the PLO must address this problem honestly and directly in the hope of defusing the deadly tension and preventing Palestinian self-rule from exploding into a bloodletting disaster.

Gush Emunim is the driving force behind the Israeli settlements. It sees the creation of Israel as an ordained event ushering in the coming of the Messianic period. "Sovereignty over the entire land," said A. Ravitsky, professor of Jewish philosophy at the Hebrew University, "became in their eyes almost the principal value of Judaism . . . This exclusivity of one value led to a loss of sensitivity about other Jewish values, like human life." Gush Emunim does not seek to displace the Arabs as long as it (the Gush) can have Greater Israel. In this respect it regards the Israeli-PLO agreement as a denial of the divine will and a cruel interruption in the process of religious redemption at whose core stands Yisrael Hashlemah (Greater Israel).

For Hamas, "the land of Palestine," as stated in its charter, "is an Islamic Waaf (trust) upon all Muslim generations till the day of resurrection; it is not right to give it up nor any part of it. Neither a single Arab state or states, nor a king nor a leader, nor any organization have such authority." Known for its hideous acts of violence, Hamas advocates jihad (holy war) in the struggle against Jewish occupation of Palestine.

This deep, contradictory religious commitment to the sanctity of the land, to which both groups are sworn, precludes on the surface any solution consistent with the Israeli-PLO declaration of principles. What is important to note, however, is that while Gush Emunim and Hamas are deadly enemies, each would tolerate the other's presence in their midst as long as it could assert total control over the land.

Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's ambiguity regarding the future of the settlements has heightened rather than eased the tension, creating a deep sense of vulnerability among many settlers. For Gush Emunim, the writing on the wall is clear. The mere fact that the future of the settlements is open for discussion two years after self-rule goes into effect, raises serious misgivings. Extending Palestinian self-rule to the entire West Bank, their leaders argue, would inadvertently lead, in time, to a Palestinian state, and time is a commodity many of them believe they simply do not have Their sense of abandonment by the government and uncertainty for the future were bound to intensify their radicalism and defiance of authority.

PLO leader Yasser Arafat's position, like Rabin's, suffers from a lack of credibility. Arafat insists that self-rule is the first step towards the establishment of a Palestinian state with East Jerusalem as its capital. Hamas does not subscribe to the PLO's position and continues to oppose the agreement on the grounds that it is selling out to the Israelis. The PLO's repeated demands to evacuate Israeli settlements often raises false expectations among the Palestinians and deep suspicion among the settlers. Moreover, the recent Hebron massacre came at the PLO's low point. Plagued by financial difficulties and an inability to show tangible progress in the negotiations, the PLO's weaknesses were further exposed while Hamas' status among the Palestinians was buttressed, making it extremely hard for the PLO to exercise its authority.

The Israeli settlements in the West Bank must not be treated like a football to be kicked around every time another act of violence is committed by either a Jew or an Arab against the other. The settlements are certainly not inconsistent with self-rule or a Palestinian state. To suggest that the existence of Jewish settlers in the West Bank negates Palestinian rights to the land also suggests that the presence of Palestinians in Israel as Israeli citizens nullifies Jewish rights to the pre-1967 land.

With the exception of relocating a few "political" settlements which have been planted in centres with dense Palestinian populations during successive Likud governments, most of the settlements will stay where they are. Once the final political borders between Israel and the Palestinian entity are drawn, some settlements will be incorporated into Israel proper, others may be relocated, and still others will continue to exist within the Palestinian political entity.

The future behavior of Hamas and Gush Emunim will be significantly influenced by Rabin's and Arafat's resolve to stay the course to peace. The PLO must not exclude but encourage Hamas to participate in the march for peace and Rabin must be direct and unambiguous regarding the future of the settlements to instil confidence among the settlers.

Gush Emunim and Hamas must know that Israeli-Palestinian interdispersement is a fact of life, making co-existence the only realistic option, one that cannot be undone short of a catastrophe. Only a compromise will guarantee rather than usurp each side's fundamental right to live freely in the land of their ancestors.

Jewish civilization and architecture

By ARNOLD AGES

One of the most beautiful rabbinic interpretations of the role of Bezalel, has it that this great man was more than an architect — he was a peace maker.

In the later chapters of Exodus, Bezalel is described as the chief architect working under Moses in the construction of the portable sanctuary in the desert.

How does an architect become a peace maker? Just before the Israelites begin building their sanctuary, they sin grievously, forcing Aaron to cast a golden calf for them to dance around and worship.

After this episode, Bezalel and his associates are called upon to build the Tabernacle, its equipment and the priestly vestments, a process which will involve the entire Israelite nation. Bezalel, the chief architect of this project, uses the opportunity to construct a sanctuary which will bring serenity, tranquillity and harmony to a community under extreme pressure. It is a sign the Israelites have been forgiven for the sin of idolatry.

From the period of the conquest of Eretz Israel until the time of Solomon, little is heard in the Hebrew Bible about architects and architecture. In fact, when Solomon builds the great Temple of Jerusalem there are apparently no Bezalels available for the task; accordingly, Solomon contracts with Hiram of Tyre to furnish the expertise and the builders for Israel's greatest shrine. Solomon's Temple is an eloquent testimony to the glory of the God of Israel but it is filtered, ironically, through the Phoenician idiom of its builders.

Jewish civilization did not produce architects again until the late nineteenth century when the European enlightenment was in full bloom. The Encyclopedia Judaica lists more than a hundred distinguished Jewish architects who have, like Bezalel of old, tried to concretize serenity and harmony through innovative use of design, structure and space.

Arnold Ages

Jewish architects, not surprisingly, have been among the first to break away from conventional forms: Alfred Messel designed the first modern department store in Berlin. Eric Mendelsohn used unique sculptural techniques in his Einstein Tower in Potsdam. Julian Flegenheimer (the brother of the great French-Jewish writer, Edmund Fleg) incorporated regal concepts in his work on the Palace of the League of Nations in Geneva. It is interesting to note that many of the most advanced house and building designs in Brazil and its capital Brasilia, were executed by Jewish architects.

In modern times names such as Alexandre Persits, Bruno Zevi, Victor Gruen, Max Abromovitz, Cecil Blankstein, Sidney Bergman and Moshe Safdie represent but a small number of the talented Jewish architects who have left their indelible impact on synagogues, universities, sports arenas, shopping centres, railway stations, business buildings and apartment complexes.

Curiously, one name which is not found in the Encyclopedia Judaica's entry under architecture is Morris Lapidus, a 90-year-old who recently delivered a public lecture on his metier in Miami Beach's Bass Museum. Over the years Lapidus has been the architect other architects love to hate and it is only in recent times that his public ostracism has come to an end. Why was this endearing figure the lightning rod for so much criticism?

In their recent work on Lapidus (Morris Lapidus Architect of the American Dream) Martina Duttman and Friedrike Schneider show that the man who designed the Fontainebleau Hotel, The Eden Roc, The Sans Souci, The Americana, and other hotels, weathered severe storms of criticism from the architectural establishment, which saw his work as the epitome of kitsch and structural naivete.

No one apparently liked Lapidus' hotels — except the tourists — who have been flocking to the extravagant creations since the 1950s. They have come in their millions to admire the banisters, balusters, circular staircases, sweeping balconies, French doors, filigreed handrails, gigantic terrariums and oversized lobby chandeliers.

Lapidus, say Duttman and Schneider, understood what people wanted in a hotel: "forget the office, the house, the kids, the bills. People wanted fun, excitement, and all of it against a background that was colorful, unexpected ... A sense of freedom from the humdrum lives the guests had . . . The joyous experience of the perfect holiday." Morris Lapidus is an architect who understood those dreams and aspirations and went on to conceptualize in stone, bronze and glass what ordinary people could only imperfectly grasp.

Lapidus has lived long enough to see his signature language of harmony, once the object of derision, highly regarded by other architects all over the world. The praise, of course, is not universal, but Lapidus' style, like Art Deco, is finally recognized as a truly original contribution to American architecture.

Yom Ha'atzmaut

Israel is celebrating its 46th anniversary on a knife-edge between hope and fear.

As these words were being written, three days before Yom Ha'atzmaut, it was not known if Hamas and Islamic Jihad would make good on their pledge to mark Israel's Independence Day with a rain of blood. But they have already made a deposit on that pledge, with the horror of the deaths in Afula.

The rage and fear of Israelis is understandable. If peace cannot bring stability and prosperity — a chance to live out of the range of bombs and knives and raise children whose education does not include weapons training — then what good is peace?

This is the precipice that Israeli negotiators must traverse in their discussions with their Palestinian counterparts in Cairo. The process of implementing the Declaration of Principles signed in Washington last September has assumed a momentum of its own. It is too late to turn back, yet the path to peace is blocked with the bodies of the victims of fanaticism and terror. The negotiators —and the politicians — must wonder if they are on a difficult climb to new heights of co-operation or on a headlong descent into chaos.

The ambiguous signals from the Palestinian side are not reassuring. When Baruch Goldstein opened fire in the Hebron mosque, Israeli Jews, from the president to the general populace, condemned the killings unequivocally. When a teenaged Hamas fanatic sought glory by killing innocent youngsters in Afula, the chairman of the Palestinian Liberation Organization was conspicuously silent.

Yasser Arafat's lack of forthrightness is of great concern. Does he not care and are all his promises to renounce violence worthless — or is he so weak that he dares not condemn Palestinian terrorism?

Yom Ha'atzmaut is traditionally a holiday of great joy, celebrating as it does the survival of the Jewish state against all odds. The fact that Israel's dedication to the search for peace has also survived 46 years of constant deadly threat is a tribute to the courage of its leaders and its people.

Where is the matching courage and dedication of those with whom Israel seeks to make peace?

Precious causes

For three days starting on the evening of April 16 after Shabbat, and continuing until April 18, the warm and generous community in Winnipeg will be hosting the seventh National Education Conference. Hundreds of educators and delegates from Canada and around the world will convene to exchange views, share ideas, formulate plans, renew old acquaintances and make new ones.

The theme of the Conference is Education and Tradition: building blocks to a Jewish future. No subject could be more important and no time more appropriate for Diaspora educators.

Jewish federations across North America, including Canadian ones, have recently awakened to the multi-faceted challenges of modern Diaspora life: assimilation, intermarriage, dropout, non-affiliation and rapidly dwindling numbers. Jewish continuity is no longer a sloganized catch-phrase. It is a serious, deeply abiding worry.

The conference in Winnipeg intends to confront this worry head on. One of its three plenary sessions is dedicated to the role of Jewish education in preserving Jewish continuity. The diverse workshop sessions that are planned will explore the inter-related aspects of the highly complicated task of providing meaningful Jewish education in a modern world full of material diversions and competing distractions.

The conference program will actually begin with a celebration of Yom Ha'atzmaut, led, appropriately, by Israel's Ambassador Yitzhak Shelef. The joining of these two precious causes — Israel and Jewish continuity — is no mere serendipity.

Many leaders and educators in both Israel and the Diaspora are increasingly recognizing that intensive, meaningful Jewish education in the Diaspora will have to include some, as yet undefined, component of "Israel" involvement. Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, the Chief Rabbi of England, was the latest authority to express this view publicly.

As conference delegates prepare for their meetings this weekend, may they seek inspiration from the words of one of Rabbi Sacks' illustrious predecessors, Rabbi Dr. Joseph Hertz, of blessed memory. On the subject of Jewish education, he wrote:

". . . Talmud Torah c'neged culam. The dearest and most dominant desire is to transmit to the children . . . the spiritual wonders of Judaism, so that they ever love and live the Jewish life and rejoice in their full Jewish heritage."

We look to the conferees with expectation and with the hope that they will be able to strike the right balance of urgency, resolve and action, and that their important deliberations will be crowned with success.

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures.

THANKS TO SCHINDLER'S LIST

Last week I was having a conversation with a gentile girl who is 16 years of age. She noticed the Chai I wear around my neck and mentioned that she had just seen the movie Schindler's List. She said that she knew very little about the Holocaust before she saw the movie, but is now eager to learn more.

When she asked me if I had lost any relatives I told her that both of my great-grandfathers, my great-grandmother, and many relatives in Poland and Russia were rounded up and shot dead by Nazi terrorists. The movie made this realistic to her.

This one girl realizing what Jews went through is to me, a small step toward putting an end to Holocaust denial. I would like to say a personal thank you to a great individual — Steven Spielberg.

PLENARY STARTED LATE

I attended the opening session of the Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region 28th Regional Plenary.

My first reaction was that I was struck by the lack of attendees under the age of 50. At the time, I could give no explanation for this. However, as the evening proceeded, the reasons became self-evident.

Firstly, the plenary started 40 minutes late. No apology or explanation was given.

Secondly, one politician, offering the usual profusion of greetings, was given the opportunity to speak for an interminable length of time, far longer than the guest panelists.

Thirdly, because of the delay in starting, the panelists, (the primary reason for attending the plenary), were all told they would only be permitted to speak for 10 minutes. It was to the credit of the panelists that they tactfully dismissed such a request.

Fourthly, numerous attendees obviously had their own agenda for the evening including harassment, heckling, raving and ranting and making themselves quite offensive.

Fifthly, a great many attendees decided to call it a night by walking out as the appreciator was thanking the panelists.

How does all of this relate to the lack of "younger attendees?"

It has been said that in today's society, more than anything else, the factor of time and its allocation, is perhaps the most precious and crucial.

People, especially those younger than many of the attendees, demand a high degree of communication standards from themselves and from their peers. For they have learned to scan and evaluate information much faster. They understand that today in business, and in one's personal life, one must seek to shorten the time it takes to reach consensus and implement policy. It's a fact of life.

Notwithstanding the inconsiderate tactic of the plenary organizers towards the attendees in wasting time, as well as the discourteous treatment by the attendees towards the panelists, I can now understand quite well the reasons why there was such a lack of younger people in attendance. Who, really, has so much time to waste?

Alan L. Simons

CONGRESS RESPONDS

Those of us who organized the plenary were proud to see that the opening session, on a Saturday evening one week before Pesach, attracted a large and representative cross-section of our community. We were pleased that the standing-room-only crowd of over 400 included people over the age of 50, (after all, life and community activism was not meant to stop at 50). And, contrary to the perception of Mr. Simons, there were numerous persons under the age of 50 in attendance.

Admittedly the start of the session was somewhat delayed. This made it possible for Shabbat observers and representatives from the various levels of government to arrive.

The speakers were uniformly excellent. There were many questions from and lots of interaction with the audience. There was the odd heckle. All these are indications of democracy in action.

After the program, many, far from leaving, stayed behind for refreshments, live Israeli and Klezmer music, and "shmoozing" in an atmosphere of "freilichkeit" and goodwill.

From the overwhemingly positive response that we have received to the entire plenary, we can only conclude that Mr. Simons' dissent constitutes a minority of one. We cannot, of course, please all of the people all of the time but, if nothing else, we are heartened that it was a Congress program which prompted Mr. Simons to express his theories publicly.

NOT BACKING "JUDENREIN"

This is a composite reply to the three letters that appeared in The CJN of March 31.

First, the notion that Peace Now has suddenly come "out of the closet" with respect to Jewish settlement in the territories is utter nonsense. Peace Now has always opposed the creation of a large Jewish presence in the West Bank and Gaza.

This opposition has nothing to do with "ethnic cleansing." It is a political/economic assessment based on years of extensive research and analysis. Our Settlement Watch Reports represent the most intensive study of the dangers (financial and political) of trying to implement a "Greater Israel" policy in a hostile and volatile social environment. It takes a thousand soldiers and hundreds of thousands of shekels to protect the small Jewish enclave in the centre of Hebron.

It is abundantly clear that the settlement push during the past fifteen years has been a dangerous, expensive and counter-productive investment.

Does this mean that the West Bank and Gaza must become "judenrein?" Not at all. Bert Raphael is absolutely right when he says that "when a Palestinian State is eventually established" Jews who decide to become citizens of that state should be allowed to "freely elect to live there." But the right of eventual citizenship is not the same as establishing politically motivated enclaves tied to Israel and designed to impose political control over the area and to crush and destroy the legitimate national aspirations of the Palestinian people. It is this dangerous political objective that is at the heart of Peace Now's opposition to Jewish settlement. When we state that Israel must choose between peace and settlements it means that it must choose between a policy of territorial control and domination and a policy of disengagement and peaceful co-existence. It can't have both.

The mystery of the unsuitable student

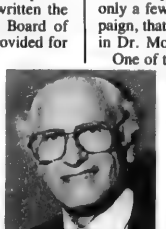
By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

It happened recently in Champaign-Urbana Illinois, locus of the University of Illinois. In consequence I was faced with a mystery, the solution of which will forever elude me.

We were at a pleasant dinner party when the talk veered toward my early days at Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati. I was asked how it was when, back in 1935, I had first entered its red-bricked precincts. It was tough, I reminisced — and now, almost 60 years later, I still appreciate how tough things are for every refugee who leaves home and goes to a strange country, torn away from a familiar environment and family. The first problem a refugee faces is losing a proper image of self. You don't quite know who you are, and neither do others.

It all goes back to the day when the late Rabbi Leo Baeck, president of our rabbinical seminary in Berlin, had asked five of us students whether we wished to accept a scholarship to Hebrew Union College in America. Would we! All of us jumped at the idea of being able to leave Nazi Germany. Hitler had been in power for over two years, and the idea of escaping what had become a prison was wonderfully attractive. Not long thereafter we left for the goldene medinah.

After a puzzling voyage — puzzling because everything we saw was new and often inexplicable — we arrived in Cincinnati. We met president Julian Morgenstern, who had written the letter of invitation on behalf of the Board of Governors and the faculty and had provided for us the key to life.



Rabbi Plaut

Not surprisingly, none of us assimilated easily in the new environment. Quite aside from the fact that we were inarticulate because of our faulty or absent knowledge of English, there was nothing at the school that reminded one of home. Unfortunately, most professors and students did not grasp what we refugees went through, what it meant to be strangers in a strange land. One might understand why the students could not appreciate our special position, but one would have expected that professors would have a better view of the emotional needs of five young men. But they really didn't, not even the president, who was a biblical scholar of renown, and was able to think clearly about past history, but, as it turned out, was not too adept at assessing the future.

About six months after our arrival he called me into his office and asked me to sit down. "Gunther," he said, "I have to tell you that we are very disappointed with you." I was deeply shocked, so that I no longer remember just what it was he was disappointed about. But the word and its implication stuck in my mind — yet it was only a few weeks ago, after my visit in Champaign, that I came to know what might have been in Dr. Morgenstern's mind.

One of the rabbis present at dinner heard my tale and said suddenly: "You know, I have read about Morgenstern and his relation to you and the other students. In fact, the matter has appeared in print. I'll find it and send you a copy." He did.

A few days later I received a photocopy of a few pages from the El Paso Jewish Historical Review, February 1987. The clippings were from an article entitled The Effort to Rescue Jewish Scholars from Nazi Germany and contained an excerpt of a letter that president Morgenstern had written to someone in Germany — probably Rabbi Baeck — in the late '30s, while we were still at the college.

Here is the section of his letter that hit home: "I must say to you very frankly (he wrote) that it is our feeling that the experiment with the Berlin students has been only partially successful. The faculty of the Lehranstalt [the Berlin seminary] picked out the five students of their institution whom they thought best qualified for admission to the Hebrew Union College and for service in the American Rabbinate. After three years of close contact with these five students . . . we feel only two of them measure up unqualifiably to the standards of our college and of the American Rabbinate. Of one other student we are somewhat uncertain, of the other two we have grave doubts as to their ability to serve in this country or elsewhere with adequate success. This will make clear to you the extreme care which must be practised in the selection of the two students from your institution [who were then expected to come]."

The author of the Review article criticized Dr. Morgenstern's lack of judgement and pointed out: "Two of the five have been presidents of the Central Conference of American Rabbis and they and the rest have served with distinction in the American Rabbinate."

Ever since I received the article. I have been wondering who was who in Dr. Morgenstern's opinion. After all, he had told me already how disappointed he was in me. Was I one of the two about whom he had grave doubts? I am afraid I will never know, for he died in 1976.

But whatever was in his mind, one fact remains: It was Dr. Morgenstern's invitation that saved my life.

Reach for the comfort of haymishe

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

Yesterday in the next-door neighbors' swimming pool (hey, living in Florida is tough!), my daughters and their friends played a game I had never seen before.

The game is called Categories. The person who is "it" calls out a category, such as Fruit or Cars or Boys' Names, and while "it" covers her ears, the others assume individual identities within the named category. This leads to strange pronouncements, such as "I'm a banana" or "I'm a Chevrolet."

When all the assignments are firmed up, "it" uncovers her ears and calls out items within the category until she names one that somebody has adopoted. For instance, she yells "Banana," and then races the banana person across the pool. If "it" wins the race, she keeps being "it." If the banana wins . . . well you get the idea.

Because I believe adults who are watching children swim should really, intently watch — not read, chat or do their nails — I began to think in categories. I realized that supposedly unrelated items break down into two main categories in my thinking: stuff that is haymishe and stuff that is not haymishe.

By haymishe — which literally translates as homey, although the literal translation doesn't catch the true drift here — I don't mean only Jewish things, although you could extend that comparison to some degree.

Erica Meyer Rauzin

I also never set out to categorize things that are overtly, ceremonially Jewish, such as braided challah, as being haymishe or not. Instead, I found myself ranking things that are haymishe because of some quirk of their intrinsic nature, such as pumpernickel with raisins.

This goes beyond the obvious comparisons (i.e., bat mitzvahs are haymishe but Sweet Sixteens are not) and extends into groceries, clothing, shopping, sports, and more.

A few examples: big department stores with familiar names and charge accounts that have been in the family two or three generations are haymishe; funky boutiques filled with neon halter-top dresses and skinny tight skirts are not. Brocade, embroidery and good fabric are haymishe; feathers are not; sequins can be, but not too many of them.

Bagels are haymishe, English muffins are not, but scones can be. Thick jam with chunks of fruit is haymishe, but thin jelly isn't. Chocolate is more haymishe than vanilla; tea is more haymishe than coffee (except early in the morning).

From sports, it seems to me that horse racing is more haymishe than drag racing; diving is more haymishe than gymnastics; and basketball and baseball are more haymishe than football and hockey. Ice skating may have felt haymishe once but it doesn't seem to anymore (except for Elaine Zayak and Torvill and Dean).

Smoky bistros with good jazz singers seem more haymishe than nightclubs with strobe lights and loud bands, even great loud bands (which I acknowledge must exist somewhere, though I have not yet encountered one).

Theatre, ballet and symphony seem more haymishe to me than opera, even though opera combines all three.

Children and old people are haymishe, aging baby boomers are not; movies are haymishe but videos are not; phone calls are haymishe but voice mail isn't. Newspapers are more haymishe than magazines; full-length juicy novels are more haymishe than short stories; radio is more haymishe than television.

Be that as it may, within television situation comedies are more haymishe than police dramas; Ted Koppel and David Letterman (thanks to his Mom) are more haymishe than Jay Leno, and Northern Exposure is far more haymishe than Picket Fences. Or just about anything else on the air.

Now that you're into the cadence of this, try on your own. It's not tough, just opinionated and arbitrary. Right now, while winter is finally fading away, while world events are too prickly to bear constant discussion, while seriousness weights us down every second, reach for the comfort of the haymishe. It's free, it's legal, it's not even fattening . . . except for the schmaltz.

More remarkable tales from The Perky Abbos

By ALLAN GOULD

Several months ago, I published what I thought to be a remarkable discovery: several chapters of a modern version of The Perky Abbos (or Excitable Fathers). Naturally, my beloved printers at this newspaper managed to mangle that into "Perry Abbos," which makes no sense at all, but such are the joys of writing humor without seeing it just before it goes to press.

Anyway, I actually received several rave letters — and they weren't even from family this time! And so, responding to (semi-) popular demand, I here present a few more chapters of this remarkable new version of Pirke Avot, discovered in a small Toronto synagogue only recently.

THE PERKY ABBOS (EXCITABLE FATHERS) CHAPTER III

1. Marv, the son of Harv, said: Think about these things, and you'll avoid an audit: Keep all receipts from where you came and where you're going, and know that someday you'll have to give account of it all. Where did you come from? Some town in Poland. And where are you going? Las Vegas for the weekend. And before whom you will have to give account? Before Revenue Canada in Ottawa, cursed be they.

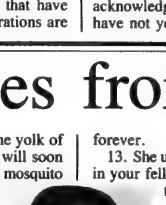
2. Reb Irv, the synagogue president, noted: Pray for the welfare of the government, because the way this economy is going, we'll all soon end up on welfare.

3. Rabbi Morris ben Ben, said, If two men sit together, and neither makes fun of others, then they were probably both asleep.

4. Rabbi Shirley declared, If three have eaten at a table, and no one offers to pick up the cheque, I wouldn't be a bit surprised.

5. Reb Charlie stated, He who keeps awake at night probably drank strong coffee just before retiring, which is pretty stupid, if you ask me.

6. Reb Nancy said, Whoever eats the yolk of the egg without the white of the egg, will soon have a higher cholesterol count than the mosquito population of Winnipeg in July.



Allan Gould

7. Reb Chalitza, son of Tracey, of the village of Thornhill, said, "When 10 people sit together and occupy a bar past closing time, they can expect a bouncer, if not the cops. But if there are only five, probably one strong bouncer should be sufficient. But their names shalt be remembered and appear in the papers, which is a shanda and a charpa.

8. Render unto the government what belongs to the government, for we all work for the government, whether we realize it or not. Oy, do we.

9. Reb Jake said, If you are driving along the highway, and you break off your thoughts and proclaim, "What a beautiful car that is up ahead!" you could well find yourself firmly attached to its rear bumper, and will be found guilty in a court of law. And thy insurance premiums shalt soar mightily.

10. Reb Sally, the daughter of Johnny, saith in the name of Meyer, Whoever forgets even one word of the Law is in Big Trouble. Remember that the difference between "Don't Steal!" and "steal!" is only one word — and five to 10 years in the slammer.

11. Rabbi Chana, sister of Dotty, saith, Fear sin, for divorce lawyers can cost an arm and a leg. And a wise lawyer can cost you two arms and two legs.

12. She also said, If you have more good deeds than college degrees, you might starve. But if you have more college degrees than good deeds, you could still starve. For this recession endureth forever.

13. She used to say: If you wish to take delight in your fellow creatures, visit a zoo. To expect to shep nachas from your own children is a lot less likely, lemme tell you.

14. Reb Dottie, daughter of Chris, noted: Sleep in the morning, for you went to bed awfully late last night. Don't drink wine at lunch, since you can no longer write it off as a business expense. Talking to children is a waste of time, because most of them nowadays don't appear to know the English language. And watching Oprah and Geraldo may be a waste of time, but how else can we see People Who Married Their Babysitter's Pets? We try to tape them when we're not at home; do you happen to have a copy of Oprah's show from last March 3? We had a blackout that day and our VCR didn't work.

15. Reb Edward of Montreal said, He who claims to love Pesach wholeheartedly probably never had 14 in-laws over for the first seder. He who mocks another man in public will probably do well on afternoon talk shows. He who pokes fun at a politician, however, is part of an ancient, revered tradition.

16. Reb Izzy declared, Grovel before your boss, for you want to keep your job, don't you? Be friendly to a younger employee, because he makes less than you, and you can always be replaced by someone cheaper, right? Tenure has gone the way of animal sacrifices. And receive all men with cheerfulness and smiles. Do this to women, however, and you could be up on harassment charges faster than a shlugged kapoprah.

17. Rabbi Achbar the Mousey said Joking and kibbitzing and clowns have their place, and that place is a Comedy Club. When the hell are you going to grow up, already??

18. He used to say, Man is beloved, but women are a lot smarter and better looking; my wife told me to say that. The people of Israel are beloved of the Holy One; now if we can only get our neighbors to start liking us, for a change.

19. All is foreseeen, especially with the new highway surveillance cameras; so learn to stay under the speed limit.

20. He used to say, The hand writes faster on the credit card than on the cheque to pay it, five months and 26 per cent interest later. And don't forget the collectors who will come to extract what you owe: Most of them used to work for Tonya Harding.

21. Reb Eli, son of Lazar Wolf, said Where there are no cops, there is no honesty. Yet where there is a robbery, there never seems to be a cop. Interestingly, when your car meter is 90 seconds expired, the cops are there in a flash.

22. He used to say: If you are smarter than others in a North American grade school, they will make fun of you. But if you are smarter than others in a high school, they will call you a browner. However, if you are smarter than everyone else in university, they will mock you and insult you and question your honesty. Astronomy and geometry are pretty good careers, but medicine should continue to pay pretty well, so don't drop that science course, please.

Herzl's conversion to Zionism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

In an original and intriguing study on Theodor Herzl, the seminal figure in modern political Zionism, a Canadian historian convincingly refutes the conventional wisdom that Herzl's conversion to Zionism was the outcome of Alfred Dreyfus' sensational treason trial in 1894.

According to the still-prevailing view, Herzl, the assimilated correspondent of the Neue Freie Presse of Vienna, was so shocked by the conviction of Dreyfus, a patriotic Jewish officer in the French army, that he was jolted out of his assimilationist delusions and turned to Zionism as a solution to the rising tide of European anti-Semitism.

Jacques Kornberg, a professor of history at the University of Toronto, contends that the celebrated Dreyfus trial had no real impact on Herzl's embrace of Zionism and his authorship of The Jewish State — the political manifesto of Zionism — in 1896.

In Theodor Herzl: From Assimilation to Zionism (Indiana University Press, $24.95 US), Kornberg argues that Herzl's preoccupation with anti-Semitism, which spawned his romance with Zionism, went back much further in time. To be sure, mounting political anti-Semitism in Austria shattered his commitment to assimilation and brought him to Zionism.

In essence, Herzl adopted Zionism as a way of resolving a personal crisis over his Jewish identity. Herzl was painfully ambivalent about his Jewish roots. On the one hand, he was borne along by feelings of inferiority. On the other hand, he was animated by pride. He solved this psychological conflict by advancing a radically novel concept of secular Jewishness, embodied in the figure of the heroic and idealistic Jew dedicated to the cause of Jewish self-determination.

In keeping with the ideas of 19th century German liberalism, Herzl believed that ghettoization had isolated Jews from the mainstream of society and rendered them superstitious, fanatic, physically weak, cowardly and incapable of "honest manual labor."

His solution? Intermarriage and conversion, which would enable Jews to shed their distinctiveness and blend in. In the early 1880s, Kornberg writes, Herzl had every reason to be optimistic about Jewish prospects in Austria. Over the previous three decades, Jews had attained civic equality and achieved a measure of social integration. Of course, anti-Semitism existed, but it lacked respectability, was a marginal political phenomenon and was shunned by the emperor. What Herzl did not, and could not, foresee was the emergence of Austrian political anti-Semitism.

As Kornberg ably shows, Herzl was shaped by his negative view of Jewry, the result of anti-Semitic stereotypes he had absorbed. He was particularly repelled by East European Jews, an old German-Jewish sickness. Kornberg explains that in order to distance himself from these Jews, he invented a claim that he himself was of Sephardic origin. He did so because Sephardic Jews were apparently held in higher repute than Ashkenazic Jews.

Theodor Herzl

In an 1881 tract entitled A Word About Our Jewry, the German historian, Heinrich von Treitschke, had asserted that Sephardic Jews were more easily assimilated than Ashkenazic Jews. It would appear that Herzl, a well-read journalist, essayist and playwright, accepted this thesis at face value.

As a reporter in France, Herzl was not immune to the anti-Semitism he witnessed and chronicled. However, Kornberg adds, he was far more affected by anti-Semitism in Austria, which he visited regularly.

Kornberg contends that, in France, anti-Semitism could not translate its popular support into political gains, was rejected by the French government and was largely disavowed by liberals. But in Austria, it evolved into "a mainstream and respectable" movement.

By 1892, Herzl regarded the Austrian variant as a powerful backlash against Jewish civil emancipation and assimilation. As Kornberg puts it: "His shock was that of an assimimilated Jew who genuinely believed that Jews had found full acceptance and a home in Austria."

By way of response, Herzl recoiled from assimilation, declaring that Jewish emancipation had been a "failure" because of anti-Semitism. But could he fall back on his Jewishness, such as it was, for succor? Before doing so, Herzl seriously considered apostasy. His friends were horrified, and Herzl shifted to a new strategy.

Rejected by the Christian world, Jews would have to transform themselves, Herzl mused. They would rid themselves of their "faults," jettison their self-contempt, and find sources of pride and self-respect in their ancestry.

Since Herzl was distant from, and even averse, to existing modes of Jewishness, he turned to Jewish biblical history for an alternative model of Jewish expression. These ideas are found in his play, The New Ghetto, finished in 1894.

For Herzl, the solution to the ageless Jewish question lay in statehood.

Through it, Jews could realize their goals of emancipation and assimilation, overcome their defects and thereby purge the stigma of Jewishness from their tormented souls.

Herzl believed that such a state, established and led by West European Jews, could "improve" East European Jews, who would constitute the majority of its population.

As is evident, Herzl's attitude to his brethren in Eastern Europe was patronizing. Kornberg points out that Herzl viewed them as culturally backward, obscurantist and stubbornly separatist, an outcome of centuries of persecution.

Furthermore, Herzl's opinion of Palestine — the Jewish ancestral homeland — was just as jaundiced. On his one visit in 1898, he was repulsed by its filth and by its fanatical religious atmosphere. "Typical of the way Europeans saw the non-European world," Kornberg observes, "he considered Palestine a blank slate on which Jews could write at will."

Although he had no special affinity for Palestine, he agreed to focus his diplomatic efforts on that largely barren Ottoman outpost because he had realized the passion it evoked in East European Jews.

Interestingly enough, Herzl saw no value in reviving Hebrew, a theme that captured the imagination of most Zionists. As he made it clear, he had no desire to create a "linguistic ghetto." The aim of Zionism, he maintained till his death in 1904, was to end centuries of Jewish isolation and rejection.

In this connection, Herzl had an unlimited faith in Zionism's ability to heal the breach between Jews and Christians. Naively, he boasted that once his plan for Jewish statehood was implemented, "anti-Semitism (would) immediately grind to a halt everywhere."

To say that he was wrong would be to indulge in understatement. Yet, for all his fanciful notions, Herzl broke new ground, and laid the foundations for Israel. For this alone, he will always be remembered.

The Jewish World

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

They died recently, leaving footprints in the sand...

Robert Kempner, a leading prosecutor at the 1946 Nuremberg war crimes trial, prepared the case against Hermann Goering, one of Hitler's chief henchmen (who committed suicide before he could be hanged). A year later, Kempner — a German Jew who emigrated to America — found what became known as the Wannsee Protocol, a record of a 1942 Nazi conference in Berlin where the Final Solution was formalized. Nine years ago, Kempner won reparations for a group of Jews who had been enslaved by the Flick industrial empire during the war.

Bernard Bellon made his mark as the author of Mercedes in Peace and War, a critical account of how the noted automobile manufacturer prospered on the backs of its workers, some of whom were concentration camp inmates, during the Third Reich. A history professor at the Georgia Institute of Technology, he left unfinished a manuscript on foreign workers in German industry during World War II.

Max Henry Fisher edited the Financial Times of London, one of the world's great newspapers, from 1973 to 1980. A refugee from Nazi Germany, he ended his career as a banker in the house of S.G. Warburg.

Andrei Sedych was editor of Novoye Russkoye, the oldest daily Russian newspaper in the world, for 15 years. Born in Odessa as Jacques Zwidak, he lived in Paris before emigrating to New York City in 1944. He wrote several books, including This Land of Israel.

Cyrus Leo Sulzberger was an American foreign correspondent and international affairs columnist for the New York Times. He joined the daily in 1939, when his uncle, Arthur Hays Sulzberger, was publisher. Sulzberger, who retired in 1977, received a special Pulitzer Prize citation for his work.

Reizl Bozyk was an enduring star of the Yiddish stage in Poland, Argentina and the United States. In 1988, she appeared in her first and only Hollywood film, Joan Silver's Crossing Delancey.

Harold Rome self-deprecatingly described himself as "an architect with no buildings to build. " In fact, Rome — a graduate of the Yale School of Architecture — was a Broadway song writer whom one critic called "a Noel Coward with a social conscience." Among his hits were Call Me Mister, I Can Get It For You Wholesale and Pins and Needles.

Herbert Tarr left the rabbinate in Long Island, New York, and turned to writing best-selling novels. He wrote The Conversion of Chaplain Cohen, Heaven Help Us and So Help Me God, among others.

Irving (Swifty) Lazar was a literary and entertainment agent par excellence who represented the likes of Ernest Hemingway, Richard Nixon, Herman Wouk, Humphrey Bogart, Cole Porter and John Houston. Lazar, who enriched himself and his clients, liked to say: "In a deal, you give and take. You compromise. Then you grab the cash and catch the next train out of town."

Rabbi Malcolm Stern was past president of the American Society of Genealogists. The book for which he is best known, American Families of Jewish Descent, was published in a third edition in 1991.

Rabbi Marshall Meyer founded the first rabbinical seminary in Latin America in Buenos Aires, where he lived for 25 years. Rabbi Meyer, a human rights campaigner, was a vocal critic of the military junta which ruled Argentina from 1976 until 1983. After returning to the United States, he helped found Tikkun, a liberal journal.

Lawrence Kadoorie was the scion of the famous Asian business clan. Kadoorie played an integral role in Hong Kong's boom after World War II.

Rita Klimova was Czechoslovakia's first ambassador to the United States after the collapse of communism in 1989.

Ben Feldman was the greatest life insurance salesman of all time, selling policies worth more than $1 billion (US) for New York Life Insurance. He crossed the $1 million-a-year-mark in 1946.

Junk mail inundates Israel

By CARL ALPERT

Have you been getting complaints about slow delivery of your mail to Israel? As a matter of fact, Israel's postal service has improved enormously in the past few years, and speedy deliveries are a matter of local pride. The difficulty, however, is that Israel is now being hit by that plague which Americans call junk mail.

With the diminution of advertising in the press and on radio and television, more and more of the advertising shekels are going into direct mail promotion. The Advertisers' Association reports that direct mail campaigns, once almost infinitesimal, now account for 12 per cent of all Israel's postal traffic, and the percentage is rising steadily. The reason: the extraordinary success of this medium in producing results. Mail order catalogues have been bringing in a 15 per cent response rate, and solicitation of contributions for philanthropic organizations yields up to 40 per cent, a fantastic result by normal American standards.

As all mail promoters will know, success is dependent on the quality of the mailing lists. Such lists are available, and for a price pass from hand to hand. The secret is, where do they come from? Some are the results of ingenuity. Thus, lists of voters are by law published by the Ministry of the Interior, and these designate both the address and the age of the citizen.

One agency lifted a corner of the veil when it reported that while it certainly does not have a list of people who suffer from heart disease, it can pick out all the voters residing in an upper class neighborhood who are 65 and over, and gamble that they are good prospects for solicitations in matters of diet, special cures, etc.

Direct mail gaining ground as advertising goes into decline

Yeshivas, which clutter up the mail considerably, pass their lists around freely, and it is not rare to get four or five solicitation letters, say around Pesach or Rosh Hashanah, from different institutions, but all in the same style of envelope and approach, indicating that they were even dispatched by the same mailing house.

A few years ago, there was an uproar when hundreds of girls, just entering their teens, were sent personal letters about feminine hygiene, with sample tampons enclosed.

Catering halls got hold of birth lists, and parents of 12-year-old boys got letters inviting them to hold the bar mitzvah party at the right hall, even indicating the exact date of the forthcoming bar mitzvah. The backlash came when some of the letters went to homes where the boy had passed away, and the parents were shocked to get invitations to celebrate the happy event.

If one is a subscriber to the Israel Philharmonic, for example, one gets mail from all kinds of musical or other cultural enterprises.

Similar lists on computers in schools, universities, hospitals, banks, insurance companies, etc., all containing bits of information that are useful to would-be advertisers, and available to anyone who knows which keys to tap. The parents of children who are failing at school may be solicited by mail for private tutoring classes, and it is not difficult for them to guess where the list came from.

There is supposed to be legislation on the books protecting the citizens' right to privacy, and more stringent laws are being drawn up, with teeth in them. At the moment an investigation is going on regarding leaks from various registries that are supposed to be restricted. Thus far, the files of the income tax office appear to have been inviolate.

The lists mysteriously continue to circulate, and in the meantime, many Israelis are finding it necessary to enlarge their mail boxes.

One of the great blights upon modern society is that of alcoholism. It is estimated that more than one million people today in the United States and Canada are alcoholics. Some four million people are near-alcoholics. There are countless millions who drink immoderately. These are cold figures. Translated into the human equation, it denotes untold ruined lives, ruptured families, appalling suffering and pathetic tragedies.

Both medical and social scientists have had great difficulty in coping with this problem. Despite the good work of such organizations as Alcoholics Anonymous, the numbers of those who are, or are near-alcoholics are steadily increasing. The fundamental and perplexing question is: What drives a person to intemperance, to imbibe excessively?

Modern writing is replete with stories dealing with this question. Some years ago there was a well-known book which later became a famous motion picture entitled The Lost Weekend. It was the chilling tale of a man who did not quite become the raving success he once imagined he would be. Consequently, he turned to the bottle — with disastrous results. Other books, films and plays have followed with sobering effects.

In biblical times there were people known as Nazarites. These were individuals who took a vow to abstain from such activities as drinking wine or other intoxicating drinks and cutting their hair.

The word "Nazarite" betokens separation or withdrawal. These people withdrew from normal living and followed a stringent code of behavior. If one wished to leave the Nazarite life, one was obliged to bring a sin-offering to the Temple. The reason for this, according to our rabbis, was that this sacrifice was an atonement for a sin. What sin had the Nazarite committed? It was the sin of denial — that is, denying oneself the joys of living.

Why should anyone wish to narrow his sphere of living? Why should anyone run away and seek to escape from happiness as if it were a plague? From whence this unnatural impulse, which runs counter to the universal law of life?

The answer is that many take this course, not out of choice, but as a reaction to untoward, often crushing experiences in life. They reach a point when they can no longer endure the give-and-take that attends ordinary living. Since joys are never wholly unconfined and untouched by sorrow, the tendency is to withdraw.

In a sense, such people attempt to punish life. They say, in effect: If life can be so cruel, if society can accord me such shabby treatment, then I want no part of it. I will chastise society by denying myself and withholding any contribution I can make. I will live for myself, by myself, and within myself.

Such is the reasoning of many who resort to austere practices, and thus turn their backs on life. Such is also the reasoning of many who overindulge in bacchanalian carousing. Extremes often bare similar patterns.

What such individuals fail to grasp is that one cannot escape life by withdrawing from it. If one is an ascetic out of conviction, it is one thing. But if one turns to self-abnegation simply as a means of recoiling from the rigors of living, then it is another matter. Similarly, if one reaches for the bottle to lose oneself in an unreal world, then far from retreating, one is only adding to the already taxing struggle for existence.

The unshakeable fact remains that many today drink heavily for the sole reason that they are ill-equipped and ill-prepared to face life. Each time a crisis appears, their impulse is to withdraw and retreat. But far from running away, they only run to situations far more deadly and destructive.

Drinking, the Bible states, may cheer and gladden the heart, only if drink is taken in great moderation. But when a person reaches a point where he feels he needs a drink, if this becomes necessary in order to relieve him of his anxiety, his frustrations and depression, then this is a drink he must not take, for drinking does not help one to overcome anxiety. It only brings one into an unreal world. This unreal world becomes harder and harder to leave in due course, and the end result is hopeless inebriation and dipsomania.

Life, even at best, is complex and entangling. Let us not add to its complications. Let us not face real problems with unreal solutions. Otherwise, the unreal soon becomes real.

Rabbi Allan M. Langner is rabbi Emeritus of Congregation Beth-El, Town of Mount Royal, Quebec.

Lubavitchers fight to see rebbe

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Tensions are running high at the Lubavitchers' ongoing vigil for their ailing rebbe, as demonstrated by the arrest last week of three Lubavitch youths charged with assaulting a chassid as he tried to enter the rebbe's hospital room.

Police charged Brooklyn residents Yanky Prager, 21, Jack Hershkop, 21 and his brother Aaron Hershkop, 17, with third degree assault, claiming the three youths beat 47-year-old Chaim Halberstam at the Beth Israel Medical Centre in lower Manhattan.

The brawl took place outside the intensive care unit where Rabbi Menachem Schneerson, the 92-year-old Lubavitch leader, breathes with the help of a respirator.

Halberstam, one of several people who regularly takes turns watching over the rebbe, reportedly left the rebbe's room in order to participate in evening prayers. When he tried to re-enter the room his path was blocked by the alleged attackers.

Halberstam, who runs the World Lubavitch Communications Centre, which distributes recordings of the rebbe's teachings, was brought to the Beth Israel emergency room and given stitches for a wound over his left eye.

From his office at Lubavitch headquarters in Crown Heights, Halberstam — who has criticized some in the Lubavitch movement for not being aggressive enough in the rebbe's medical care — said the incident was part of a "game of power" between people within the Lubavitch movement who are battling for access to the rebbe.

Halberstam said the attackers could not have gained access to the heavily guarded seventh floor of the hospital without approval from someone in the Lubavitch leadership.

Prager, one of the three men charged in the attack, said he had come to the seventh floor to pray and was asked by someone in the Lubavitch movement — whom he would only identify as a "higher authority" — to prevent Halberstam from going back into the room.

Prager said that, contrary to the police report, Halberstam attacked the group of young men, forcing them to restrain him in "self-defence."

Israel-PLO peace said still possible despite ongoing problems

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Yes, peace is attainable," was the consensus reached by Lawrence Hart and Rashad Saleh at a debate held last week at Temple Sinai. The forum on Israel-Palestinian peace negotiations, which gave rise to lively but civil discussion, attracted about 200 people and was staffed by at least three uniformed police officers. (The debate took place on April 5, the night before the terrorist attack by a Hamas suicide bomber in Afula.)

Hart chairs the Institute for International Affairs of B'nai Brith Canada (BBC), Central Region, and Saleh is chair of Palestine House. Their debate was co-sponsored by the temple's social action committee and the BBC Institute for International Affairs. Rabbi Michael Dolgin, assistant rabbi of Temple Sinai, moderated the discussion.

Saleh maintained that Arabs and Jews lived harmoniously for centuries until "the emergence of the Zionist movement."

Recent changes in the world as well as in the Middle East specifically, such as the break-up of the former Soviet Union and the effects of the intifadah, have given "either side no alternative but to co-operate [in the peace process]," said Saleh.

"Israel must concede land for peace, must end the occupation and all its byproducts [including] intimidation, racism and denial of human and national rights," he said, adding that "the issue of Arab Jerusalem has to be addressed."

Hart disagreed: "It was stated quite clearly [in the Declaration of Principles (DoP)] that the status of Jerusalem would not be discussed in the immediate future, and certainly not in the next three years," Hart said in his rebuttal.

Hart also noted that the PLO's offer of peace and recognition "implied the suppression of violence in the territories." That "has not come to pass," he noted.

Saleh attributed Palestinian post-DoP violence to "Israeli intransigence in moving ahead and implementing the DoP.

"By Dec. 13 Israeli withdrawal [from Gaza and the West Bank] should have started," he said. "Israel was dragging its feet."

Saleh also accused the Israeli government of starting the violence two weeks after the signing by rounding up Fatah leaders who had come out of hiding. "That's how Israel embraced the agreement," he said. "That for sure created bad feelings between the Israeli and Arab communities."

"We now need to build on the bridges that have already been built," Hart said. "We need to acknowledge that Rabin did go out on a limb." Referring to last week's agreement to deploy over 100 Norwegians, Danes and Italians as observers in Hebron, Hart said that having such an "outside force" was "unheard of in modern [Israeli] history."

Hart noted that "we haven't seen any progress in the revocation of [parts of the Palestinian covenant referring to the destruction of Israel]."

Saleh said there would be no such changes "until the Israelis withdraw from the occupied territories and [there is] a final solution to the problem there. It's not up to Arafat. It's up to the Palestinian [National] Council."

Saleh noted that "things are changing rapidly" and said that "maybe by next summer" there will be changes in the covenant.

On the subject of Arab inequality in Israel, Hart noted the presence of an Arab Israeli judge on the commission examining the Hebron massacre, and wondered whether a Jewish judge would be in that position were the situation reversed.

"Although some complain [Israeli Arabs] don't have the same privileges, they do have the same rights," Hart said.

"Sure, Israel is democratic for Jews," said Saleh, whose words were at odds with his relaxed manner. "Jews all over the world have the right to return. I think Palestinians who lost their home 40 years ago have more right to return than those whose ancestors lost their homes 2,000 years ago." Saleh claimed that the PLO is the "only democratic institution in the Middle East."

He lauded the "humanitarian signs" shown by Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and "many Israelis in the peace camp" in the wake of the Hebron mosque massacre, but added that "we have to blame the Israeli government for putting those settlers there."

A question and answer session following the debate elicited a blunt question for Saleh: How can we trust Arafat and the Palestinians?

"The coin has two sides," responded Saleh. "How can we trust the Israelis? Treat us with respect and see what you get in return. We are very well known [for] honor." Saleh said that Palestinians in Israel (then Palestine) and in Toronto took in European Jews fleeing the Holocaust.

The questioner sat down shaking his head.

"We lived before [in peace], and we are going to in the future," insisted Saleh.

When asked what initiatives could overcome mutual suspicion and stereotyping, Hart pointed to economic development as "an obvious area of emphasis," while Saleh said that economic development was "not even an issue" for Israeli Arabs. [They] are looking for security, safety and protection," he said. "If the Israelis can offer them that, I think trust will be built and both communities will live together."

An audience member who said she "desperately wants to trust" asked about plans for future dialogue "where maybe we won't be quite as civil...but understanding the ground rules."

Saleh noted that he has been involved in dialogues with Peace Now, B'nai Brith and Canadian Jewish Congress. "The process is going on."

Hart agreed that more discussion is needed. "I think there is a need to educate each other, to discuss [our] different interpretations of history," he said. "In many areas, we're poles apart. It's encouraging that we're able to have this kind of debate."

Canadian-Israeli similarities

TORONTO — "Canada and Israel have a lot in common and much to learn from each other," says Professor Arie Schachar of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

"One of the objectives of the Canadian Studies Program at the Hebrew University is to raise faculty and student awareness of these similarities."

The Leon Safdie professor of urban studies, Shachar also serves as director of the Hebrew University's Institute of Urban and Regional Studies, and for the last 12 years has been chair of the University's Halbert Centre for Canadian Studies.

The centre, which is co-sponsored by Ralph and Roy Halbert of Toronto and the Government of Canada, brings Canadian professors to the Hebrew University to teach courses on Canada and conduct research of mutual benefit to Canada and Israel. Nearly 40 scholars have participated in the program since its inception in 1976. One of the most active centres of Canadian studies in the world, it promotes research on Canada in numerous disciplines, initiates joint Hebrew University-Canadian research projects, organizes public lecture series and conferences on subjects of mutual interest, publishes books and working papers, awards scholarships in post-graduate Canadian studies.

Hate, bias crimes seen as threat to society

Could result in increased tension, says Congress

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Hate or bias crimes create the potential for escalating violence through reprisals.

This was the warning given to the police multicultural committee of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police by Erwin Nest, director of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) Pacific region, at a recent meeting.

"By making members of minority communities fearful, angry and suspicious of other groups, and of power that is supposed to protect them, these incidents can damage the fabric of our society and fragment communities," Nest said.

Nest told the chiefs that failing to recognize and effectively address bias crimes could cause an isolated incident "to fester and explode into widespread community tension."

Because of the relatively small number of hate crimes, many law enforcement agencies have been slow to establish separate policies and procedures for investigating and documenting these crimes, Nest said.

"There has also been a reluctance to establish separate hate crime reporting forms or to modify existing crime reports," he added, or to keep hate crime statistics.

Nest said studies have shown special reporting systems can have a salutary effect on law enforcement, as well as "demonstrate to the community that law enforcement officials have genuine interest in the problem of hate crimes and a commitment to vigorously pursuing the perpetrators."

The Vancouver city council's advisory committee on race relations is just one group which has produced a definition of what constitutes a bias crime.

The Vancouver definition says "a bias-related incident is an act or attempt by an individual or group directed at a person, property or public order that demonstrates intentional hostility to another because of that person or persons' race, religion, sexual orientation, national origin or ethnicity."

Nest said threatening phone calls, hate mail, vandalism, cross burning, destruction of religious symbols and fire bombings are not included in the definition but the Vancouver police department has given assurances that all of these acts are covered in training members of the force.

Nest believes a good definition will allow statistics of bias-related incidents to be kept. "By compiling statistics and charting the geographic distribution of these crimes, law enforcement officials will be able to discern patterns and anticipate an increase in racial tensions in a given community or jurisdiction."

The Vancouver police board approved the definition of bias-related incidents and it has been incorporated into the regulations and procedures manual of the police force, Nest said.

MPPs pay tribute to Holocaust survivors

chairs Miriam Gelbloom and Joel Dimitry.

Former partisans receiving the provincial commendations were Noah Norman Shneidman, Maria Son and Norbert Kerenyi.

Survivors receiving the citations were Herman Gottesman, Henry Zagdanski, Cantor Louis Danto, Eva Kerenyi, Max Guttman, Adam Fuerstenberg and Ernest Raab.

In his remarks, Jackman said, "The Holocaust was something revealed to the average Canadian after the fact. The Holocaust is not just for Jewish people, but for all mankind ... a reminder of what can happen."

Moments later in the House, MPPs acknowledged the presence of all the recipients.

Harnick cited the film Schindler's List and told the House he hopes it's the start of an educational process that will become part of school curricula.

He paid tribute to survivors, saying their stories "are a song, a hymn of praise, a testimony to the eternity of the Jewish people and the greatness of their spirit."

Ziemba too rose to mark Yom Hashoah.

She cited the B'nai Brith Canada League for Human Rights 1993 audit of anti-Semitic incidents in this country, which indicated a 30 per cent rise in anti-Jewish activity last year over 1992.

"That is totally unacceptable to all of us and also quite frightening."

Ziemba called on all Ontarians to build a peaceful and harmonious society.

Kwinter referred to a poll in the United States that showed a significant number of Americans believe the Holocaust never happened.

"Try telling that to the 350,000 survivors of the Holocaust, a number that is diminishing every year... Try telling that to my uncles, who were imprisoned in Bergen-Belsen and who saw their relatives killed. Tell them that it was a figment of their imagination."

March of the Living participants discuss plans

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In preparation for a once-in-a-lifetime trip to Poland and Israel, teenage participants, midrachim (chaperones), Holocaust survivors and consultants to the 1994 March of the Living met recently at the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) of Toronto for their final orientation session.

The theme of the session presented by Mark Charendoff, director of Judaic and Cultural Development of the JCC, was an introduction to Israel. Five other sessions, including a Shabbaton, covered a number of topics, including the Holocaust and Poland. The coordinator of the March of the Living is Chaia Berkowitz, associate director of Judaic Cultural Development of JCC, and the co-chairs are Hilda Cohen and Ralph Shedletsky.

The session on Israel was designed to give the participants a knowledge and understanding of the geography and history of Israel from early Zionism to the present. Following Charendoff's overview, which included the changing borders in the Middle East in the 20th century, the participants broke into groups to discuss the factors essential for the survival of the Jewish people. Their assignment was to reach a consensus by prioritizing the 10 most important factors for Israel's survival.

From across Canada, more than 350 students between the ages of 15 and 18, including 121 from Ontario, will join thousands of other Jewish young people from around the world. They observe Yom Hashoah (Holocaust Memorial Day) in Poland and Yom Ha'atzmaut (Israel Independence Day) in Israel.

All the participants have been involved in an intense educational program which will continue throughout their trip and after their return to Canada.

David Phillips, a Grade 11 student at Northern Secondary School, the grandson of Holocaust survivors, told The CJN, "The March of the Living is an excellent opportunity for me to learn and get more of a feel for the Holocaust that my family went through. Already I have learned much about European Jewry and have discussed what I learned with my own friends. Through this trip, I hope to make new friends and learn how to stop discrimination of all kinds."

Jodi Kouitz, a Grade 10 student at Forest Hill Collegiate says she is looking forward to "this incredible trip more than anything I have before. The friendships that I have made will last a lifetime and the sights that I will see and the experiences will be imprinted in my memory forever. No matter how much we read, learn or hear about the Holocaust, we can never prepare ourselves enough for what we are about to experience."

Josh Wolff-Delvca, a Grade 11 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto said that the training sessions were very informative. "I feel that they have prepared me well for the 1994 March. I feel that by attending the March of the Living, I am fulfilling my duty as a modern Jewish teenager by keeping the memories of the Holocaust alive as well as transforming a part of my heritage to a part of my every day life."

Holocaust survivor Irving Eisner, author of Dachau: Prisoner 89012, who has been an educator at the Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto since 1946, is one of the three survivors accompanying the Ontario group as a chaperone, guide and living witness.

Eisner says, "To me, it is a privilege — a sad one — to go and to be able to say kaddish at the grave somewhere in Birkenau of my dear mother, three sisters, a brother and six million of my people. I am going to say to the kedoshim that we are here, we are your descendants, we come to proclaim to the whole world and say, never, never again."

In Auschwitz-Birkenau, the group will participate in a symbolic March of the Living, retracing the steps that hundreds of thousands of Jews and others were forced to take on the way to their annihilation.

There will be a religious service commemorating all the victims of the Holocaust. Groups will visit a number of Polish cities that were once vibrant centres of Jewish life and learning, including Warsaw, Krakow and Lublin, and visit other Holocaust- related locations such as Treblinka and Majdanek.

The groups will be in Israel for Independence Day, where they will join with millions of Israelis in celebrating the miracle of the founding of the State of Israel.

In Israel, programs for all groups will be revised to avoid visiting the West Bank.

Cohen says that the March of the Living is, in effect, "a training ground for the future generation of Jewish leaders in Canadian life."

Canada's immigration policy: Humanitarian or hard-nosed?

Refugee determination process 'improving'

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Anab Osman came to Canada as a refugee, like scores of other Somali women.

Fearing murder, rape, torture and humiliation, they fled the chaos of their native country to find safety in Canada, she said.

Many lost their husbands, their children, their property and generations of inheritance. "They lost these things for good."

Speaking at a forum that opened Refugee Awareness Week, which commemorates the 1985 Supreme Court of Canada decision giving refugees the right to a full hearing, Osman gave an emotional and often painful account of her experiences in Somalia.

The war in that East African state was "unexpected, senseless and crazy," she said. "It was neighbors and families who killed each other."

People fled the carnage, walking from city to city hoping to find safety and calm. Many carried their children on their backs. Many starved to death, she said.

Girls were violated to humiliate their families. Others were kept by their enemies "for months for their use."

Try to put yourself in their shoes and consider their jarring experiences, she told about 50 people at Toronto City Hall.

Osman's moving tale brought into perspective the horrors that prompt refugees into seeking new lives elsewhere.

Michael Schelew, deputy chair of the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB), said that since accepting that post a few months ago he has attempted to establish procedures to help board members reach decisions on refugee determination in a more equitable manner.

He said he's advised board members that if a person is credible and comes from a country with a record of rights violations, then there should be no reason to deny that applicant refugee status.

Lawyer Lorne Waldman said the question of refugee rights is so heated that some advocates for refugees have received threatening telephone calls and even bullets in the mail. But he knows of many Canadians who have been "transformed" by meeting refugees and hearing their stories.

Acknowledging changes implemented by Schelew, Waldman said he has seen some improvement in the calibre of refugee board members. He called for "an open, transparent process" so all board members are selected in the same way.

Elsa Musa, refugee and emergency co-ordinator for the Anglican Church, said about 80 per cent of the world's refugees are women and children. They are often subjected to atrocities to "punish" the community they come from.

Ezrom Mokjakala, a native South African who is co-chair of the Toronto Refugee Affairs Council, said refugee-receiving countries put their economic interests ahead of humanitarian concerns when considering which refugees to accept.

Parvathy Kanthasamy, a research associate at the Centre for Refugee Studies at York University, said the IRB does not rely on Amnesty International reports and that of other groups which have outlined human rights violations in Sri Lanka, where thousands have disappeared while in custody.

She also questioned whether, in rendering their decisions, IRB members understood the plight of people who were forced to flee for their lives without any identification documents.

Nanda Na Champassak, a representative of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees, said there are about 20 million refugees and displaced people worldwide. About 30 per cent are in Africa.

Refugee Awareness Week, which was proclaimed by Toronto Mayor June Rowlands, includes programs that showcase refugee artists, advocacy workshops, a candlelight vigil and a festival dance with world music.

Unskilled immigrants lower wages

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN & RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Canada is in danger of creating a permanent underclass of unskilled workers, if it does not reduce the current numbers of unskilled immigrants entering the country, warns the author of a book on Canadian immigration policy.

"The current immigration policy makes no sense because it is designed for a world that no longer exists, says Daniel Stoffman, a former journalist with the Toronto Star and recipient of the 1991 Atkinson fellowship in public policy. "It is designed for a world where there are labor shortages when in fact, there are job shortages."

Stoffman was part of a recent symposium and panel discussion on the impact of immigration and refugee policy on community, race and ethnic relations in the 1990s. The evening at North York's city hall was presented by the North York committee on community, race and ethnic relations.

The panel also included Gordon Chong, general committee chair; Harry Herman, former member of the Canadian Immigration and Refugee Board, convention refugee determination divsion; Howard Greenberg, immigration lawyer and chair of the immigration section of the Canadian Bar Association; Ted Richmond, Ontario Council of Agencies Servicing Immigrants; and Elyse Graff, executive director, Canadian Council of Christians and Jews.

Stoffman said that the immigration policy, "an ultra-right wing policy with the endorsement of ideological right-wingers, consists of high immigration with concentration on unskilled labor.

"Immigration is being used to put pressure on labor unions and put a downward pressure on wages," he said. "It also creates a permanent underclass which is not a positive factor for race relations."

Stoffman pointed out that the percentage of immigrants coming in on the point system, which allows newcomers to enter Canada based on merit, has been cut by half since the early 1970s. The direct result, he said, is that the recent immigrant is three times as likely to be illiterate as a Canadian-born person.

He also noted that the numbers of unskilled immigrants coming to Canada, including many who spoke neither English nor French, rose while the federal Conservatives were in power.

Stoffman said he advocates lowering immigration levels from 250,000 a year to 150,000 and favors selecting those who are skilled and educated.

He expressed concern that the "poisonous" combination of bill 79, the Ontario government's employment equity legislation, together with current levels of immigration, will create social tensions as white able-bodied young men find themselves stuck at the back of employment lines and at the bottom of promotional ladders.

Panelist Greenberg objected to what he called Stoffman's presentation of the government's immigration policy as a right-wing conspiracy.

"It is a frightening thought if that was true, but what a serious allegation to make," he said.

He reported that with the government's recent changes to the immigration system greater numbers of educated immigrants with high level language skills have been coming to Canada.

"We have to understand that immigration can be positive and the policy can be changed to be made better," he said. "I do not think that everyone in Canada should look like me or look like you."

Herman contended our refugee policy is unfair to both taxpayers and refugees as we spend enormous amounts of money on "refugees from non-refugee countries" who have the money to come to Canada.

With regard to Stoffman's speech, Richmond said that part of the neo-conservative agenda is to pose things only in economic criteria.

"A fairly substantial body of evidence reveals that not only is immigration beneficial, but also that the overall effect immigration has on raising the income of non-immigrants is neutral," he said.

A $100,000 'get well card'

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Corresondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg chapter of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU) is sending Larry Rosenberg, its immediate past president, a "get well card" with a difference.

The organization has launched the Larry Rosenberg Stay-Well Fund in Cancer Research at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, with a fundraising target of $100,000.

Last August, Rosenberg was diagnosed as having an inoperative brain tumor. With his usual positive approach to life, Rosenberg is convinced he is going to beat the odds.

"When [current CFHU Winnipeg chapter president] Howard [Morry] first mentioned this fund and asked if I wanted it, I said absolutely," Rosenberg proclaimed. "Nothing is more important than supporting the Jewish community and the State of Israel. As a past president of the Winnipeg chapter, I feel very honored by this."

Just 38, the chartered accountant and partner in Arthur Andersen & Co.'s Winnipeg office has already made a substantial impact on his community. In addition to his work with the CFHU, where he co-founded the very successful Professional and Business Division and served as national co-chair of the CFHU Young Leadership Division, Rosenberg has won the Winnipeg Jewish Community Centre Max Nathanson Young Leadership Award, has chaired the Combined Jewish Appeal's Accountant's Division, is a member of the finance committee of Jewish Community Campus of Winnipeg and is a board member of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba and the Health Sciences Centre Foundation.

At the moment, he says, he is taking a break from his community activities and conserving his energy.

CFHU Winnipeg executive director Anya Makow reports that $12,000 has already been raised toward the Rosenberg fund. The organization is planning to approach Arthur Andersen branches across the country as part of the campaign.

Jewish school team is tops in basketball

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, Winnipeg's Jewish high school, has won the Manitoba provincial Double A varsity boys' basketball championship for 1994.

Led by playoff Most Valuable Player Guy Kedem and tournament all-star Jeremy Shinewald, the JWC team edged a team from Morden 91-89 in the final game March 20 to take its first title since 1989.

According to Greg Beddome, one of the coaches, the game featured a nail-biting conclusion. For most of the contest, JWC had a sizeable lead. They were up by 13 points at the half and 19 points near the end of the third quarter.

Dedicated players

In addition to Kedem (whose father, Ze'ev, is the Jewish National Fund shaliach in Winnipeg) and Shinewald, other team members include fellow Grade 12 students Josh Share, Randal Shore, Michael Schacter and Shane Kozlowich, Grade 11 students Richard Tapper (who won a sharpshooting skills competition at the championship tournament), Kolbi Ludwig, Kovi Smolack and David Begleiter and Grade 10 student Jared Steinfeld.

Team managers were Shana Wolch, Arona Podheiser and Adena Borodkin. Kevin Abrahams is co-coach.

"We have had a dedicated, committed group of guys who enjoy playing the game," said Beddome. "I have been coaching the Grade 12 players since Grade 9. How we do next year depends on the freshman, their attitude and commitment. They still have a lot to learn."

South African changes expected to affect Jews

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — After the transition to multi-racial rule later in April, the 120,000 Jews of South Africa will share the fate of the country's five million whites, says Nathan Lochoff.

A Victoria resident who came from South Africa six years ago, Lochoff has kept in close contact with the rapidly-changing scene in his homeland.

Whatever happens after the black-led African National Congress (ANC) takes power, Jews will be in the same boat as all whites, but they will not be singled out as Jews, Lochoff told The CJN.

Lochoff attended law school in Johannesburg with Nelson Mandela, who will likely be the next president of South Africa, and worked for Mandela and his partner, Oliver Tambo as a barrister. Racial laws allowed Mandela to act only as a solicitor. He and Tambo could not appear in the higher courts, and Lochoff handled their cases.

In 1990, South African President F. W. de Klerk, head of the National Party, freed Mandela, who had spent 25 years in jail for attempting to achieve equality for the blacks.

Lochoff visited his old home shortly after this, and looked up Mandela, who immediately recognized him. They discussed the future, especially the situation of South African Jews.

Lochoff said Mandela had been widely supported by Jews in the early days of his struggle, and Mandela told him he will be forever grateful, especially to the Jewish lawyers in Johannesburg and the Jewish doctors of Capetown who were very solicitous of him while he was in jail.

There is a good possibility, Lochoff added, that Richard Goldstone will be appointed by Mandela as chief justice of South Africa. Goldstone is the Jewish judge who headed a commission of inquiry set up by de Klerk, which recently reported that a "third force," consisting of high officials in the police department, has been trying to destabilize the efforts of Mandela and de Klerk, to bring democracy to the country.

As for Israel, Mandela told Lochoff, "I am a Zionist. I believe in the right of the Jews to live safely and securely within their own borders in a state of their own." But he did not define those borders.

Asked if Mandela is a Communist, Lochoff said the ANC leader was never a Communist "and was always, to my own knowledge, very anti-communist. But the ANC, it has to be admitted, is an umbrella party. It isn't monolithic, and has had within it all the people involved in the struggle against apartheid — including a large number of Communists."

Lochoff thinks the economic situation and the question of wealth is a "very profound and almost insoluble problem" Mandela will face. The economic structure has been an "inverted pyramid." A small percentage of whites own virtually the whole wealth of the country, while the blacks, who constitute such a large majority, are impoverished.

'Road to democracy is bumpy'

"The road to democracy will be bumpy and it's not inconceivable that things will get worse before they get better," he said.

But, added Lochoff, "my own feeling is that the ultimate outlook for this extremely favored country, from the point of view of natural resources and climate, and every other way, has a very fine future. What will happen until that future starts remains to be seen."

A major problem is that Mandela is 75 and "how long he personally will remain is doubtful." What will happen when he is gone is hard to foretell, said Lochoff.

Fortunately, there are capable deputies, one of whom is Cyril Lamposa. "I don't know him personally, but from what I've read about him, he appears to be a person who would follow in Mandela's footsteps completely," Lochoff said.

There are others who are highly able and stable "but whether they will be able to withstand the masses, who have been deprived of all political and economic rights for so long, who didn't get much education during the many years of disturbances, and who are being called the lost generation, is hard to say."

On the whole, Jews have been permitted to live a Jewish life in South Africa since they began settling there in the 19th century. Lochoff said there are occasional incidents like graffiti on the walls, "the sort of thing that happens here . . . there were one or two cases of bomb attacks against synagogues.

"There is a Jewish day school system throughout the country attended by a large number of Jewish children."

However, as political uncertainty grew and economic sanctions began to bite, Jews started leaving South Africa in large numbers for Israel and other destinations. Many came to Canada, especially Toronto.

The big problem in leaving is that emigrants can't take their capital or assets and are permitted to draw only dividends or interest. Lochoff said he personally is living solely on his South African income "and whatever little I've been able to accumulate since I've been here. It's a sort of sword of Damocles hanging over our heads and one doesn't know what will happen."

(Former MP and B.C. premier Dave Barrett and his wife Shirley are currently in South Africa as part of a Canadian team observing the country's first one-person one-vote national elections.)

Harold and Paula Taub

JNF to honor Windsor couple

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

WINDSOR — Paula and Harold Taub, a couple described as "dedicated leaders in both the Jewish and secular community," have been named Windsor's 1994 Negev Dinner honorees.

Jewish National Fund of Windsor president Jerry Goldberg announced the dinner will take place June 15 at the Windsor Jewish Community Centre.

Lawyer Alan M. Dershowitz, whose clients have included Anatoly Sharansky and Jonathan Pollard, is the guest speaker.

Dinner chairs are Joseph Eisenberg and Fred Katzman. Alan Ackerman, Gary Katz and Rabbi Jonathan Plaut are campaign chairs.

Paula Taub, born Paula Levine in Detroit, began her community involvement as president of Lillian Wald chapter, B'nai Brith Girls. A graduate of Wayne State University, she moved to Windsor following her marriage to Harold.

Deeply immersed in Jewish communal activities, she was president of her Hadassah-WIZO chapter, chaired the building planning committee for the expansion of Beth El synagogue and served as the comgregation's first female president.

Active in Windsor United Jewish Appeal (UJA) for over 20 years, Paula has served in various capacities, including that of women's division chair.

Active canvasser

Currently vice-president of Windsor JNF, she is also a long-standing member of the Windsor Jewish Community Federation board of directors and has for many years been an active canvasser for the Canadian Cancer Fund.

In 1991, Paula was a member of Beth El's first b'not mitzvah class, celebrating her bat mitzvah after two years of study.

Harold is a native of Windsor. He attended the I.L. Peretz Shule, Assumption University and Osgoode Hall Law School, was named Queen's Counsel in 1984 and is now a partner in the law firm of Muroff, Taub and Rohaly.

He has been active in B'nai Brith and the Jewish Community Centre, especially in the theatre workshop and as chair of the playbill committee.

He also served as co-ordinating chair of planning, financial and building aspects for the I.L. Peretz senior citizen residence.

It was during Harold's term as Federation president that Windsor won the Council of Jewish Federations of North America's Charles Goodal Award for Outstanding Small Communities for its summit committee, created to maintain unity and communication among the community's religious institutions. The committee still functions today.

Long involved in UJA, Harold was this year's campaign co-chair, and is currently chair of Beth El's endowment fund committee as well as a member of the JNF board.

Since Harold's first trip to Israel in 1969 to attend the first International Congress of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists, both he and Paula have visited Israel eight times.

The couple's two children are Sharyl, an MBA graduate of the University of Windsor, married to Detroit attorney Alan Ackerman and a mother of three; and Jeffrey, a pediatric hematologist oncologist at Children's Hospital of Michigan, married to Rene, an administrator with a business firm.

CZF helps youth to visit Israel

MONTREAL — For close to 25 years the Youth and Hechalutz Department of the Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF) has been offering Jewish youth the opportunity to visit Israel and connect with the land and its people.

This year is no different. Youth aged 15 to 24 can choose between seven itineraries ranging in length from one month to just under six weeks.

Mara Levine, 16, had been to Israel nine times to visit relatives before she went again last summer on CZF's Kibbutz encounter program.

There the Montreal teen spent six weeks working on Kibbutz Nachson near Tel Aviv and travelling around the country. She said she learned more that summer than on any of her previous visits.

"I loved the Negev and the hiking we did there. I would have spent the entire summer doing it if I could have," she said.

"At one time, we spent the better part of a day in the Ramon crater. We had to descend with a metal ladder so steep it was like rappelling. Lots of people didn't do it and I feel sorry they missed out."

Levine and her group of 40 also went to Ranana, Rosh Hanikra, Eilat and everywhere in between. There were 25 Montrealers, with the balance coming from Toronto and Ottawa. Levine said it is an experience she'll never forget.

"I think that, thanks to this program, I really matured over the summer. I dealt with situations I had never dealt with before and learned a lot about interactng with other people."

Zionist perspective

Jesse Guberman, 18, had his bar mitzvah in Israel. He went back last summer with the Israel Dimensions tour, along with teens from British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes.

"We were all of the same age group and could really relate to one another," the Montreal high school student said.

Tour participants are shown Israel through a Zionist perspective in a safe but balanced manner. "The worst thing I have to say [about the trip] is that it would be nice to spend more time everywhere," said Guberman. "For that, I'll just have to return some day. Who knows, maybe I'll make aliyah."

Sharon Kivenko, 18, spent four weeks last summer hiking through the country with CZF's Israel Trek.

"I loved it," said the Montreal native. "It was great to test our limits, to know what we were capable of."

The 25 people in Kivenko's group hiked from the Kinneret to the Mediterranean, with a stopover near Kibbutz Sde Boker, home of the late Prime Minister David Ben Gurion, for a survival program.

"We got to know everyone [in the group]. On a trip like this, you need people you can really rely on and the initmacy you develop helps push you through the hike."

The CZF trips range between $3,400 and $4,500 and include airfare, accomodation and entrance fees. Participants can cycle through Israel, or join Israel on Ice for a unique hockey experience. For more information contact the CZF Youth and Hechalutz Department at (514) 486-9526 or the nearest Israel Program Centre.

RAE VISITS AMAL SCHOOLS

On a recent visit to Israel, Premier Bob Rae and his wife Arlene Perly Rae visited one of the Amal Schools in Petah Tikva. This is one of the schools that was the recipient of funds for perpetual scholarships in the name of Hannah and Al Perly, Arlene's parents, that was raised at a reception held last year at the Sheraton Centre Hotel. Amal Schools, which are trade union and directed, can be found in Jewish, Arab and Druze communities. With the Raes are (from left) Hadayan Nasereden, scholarship recipient from Nisra Villa and Gila'ad Karmanshay, scholarship recipient from Amal Petach Tikva.

For me it goes back to when I was a kid. I've always been close friends with animals. Because we always had animals.

My horse, Andy, was my soulmate and confidant. I think the reason that girls latch on to horses so much is because when you're a kid, you're powerless. And when you're a kid and a girl, you're even more powerless. So you feel empowered when you have a horse because it's this big animal you have control over. And no one else has more control over it because it's your horse and it knows you. Even my parents were afraid of him.

I don't have him anymore. I rode and jumped competitively from age 10 to 17 in Nova Scotia. He was my absolute obsession and my whole life for those years before I got into music. I guess you can say I switched obsessions.

Now he lives happily on an island off the coast of Nova Scotia with a couple of true Maritime eccentrics. They live in a castle they built themselves and every year they build more onto it. They're the only ones on the island, except for their 52 cats - and Andy.

The incredible thing about animals is that they don't judge you in the same way people do. They don't care about your failures and successes. It's pure, unconditional love.

I've always felt that you should just let animals go. Not give them too many rules. You know, just like people.

How I See Obsession.

Spring kosher cooking classes

TORONTO — The Kashruth Council of Toronto, affiliated with Vaad Haraboni of Toronto, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress, has announced its lineup of spring COR cooking classes.

Vivian Anhang

"Our cooking classes continue to attract large numbers of participants and . . . we are pleased to present three new and exciting sessions," says a spokesperson for the council. "For the spring season, by popular demand, we are also repeating Mediterranean Cooking."

The classes and demonstrations will be given by Vivian Anhang, a teacher and graduate home economist with many years' experience in presenting food-related programs to all segments of the community.

The classes will again be held at the Shaarei Tefillah Congregation, on Tuesday evenings at 8 p.m. There is ample parking and convenient public transportation. The adult fee for each class is $15; students under 16 pay $10 a session.

Hot and Cold (V23) is a new class on May 3. The cooking demonstration will feature hot or cold Shabbat and summer dishes, including a fruit soup, sweet and sour fish, meat, potato kugel, stuffed zucchini and apple pie.

Mediterranean dishes on agenda

On May 10, Mediterranean Cooking (V11) will be repeated. This class will feature a selection of Mediterranean-Middle Eastern dishes including stuffed grape leaves, eggplant salad, egg lemon soup, khoubs, baked lamb shank and tomato sauce, black-eyed beans and baklava.

A new class, International Salads and Desserts (V24) on May 24 will take you around the globe with dishes including Israeli avocado salad, Greek salad, Chinese sprout salad, French cafe au lait, kahlua cheesecake and Danish pastry.

Healthful Living (V25) will feature a lecture and discussion on healthy eating and lifestyle. Dietitian/nutritionist, Sharon Gottlieb will be featured and a cooking demonstration of low fat high fibre recipes will include vegetable soup, marinated fillet of sole and apple crisp.

The classes, which are open to all, are limited in enrolment, with registration on a first-come first-served basis.

To register, send your name, adddress, postal code, phone number (home and work) and a postdated cheque dated the day of each class to: Information and Public Relations, Kashruth Council of Toronto, 4600 Bathurst St., Suite 240, Willowdale, Ont. M2R 3V2.

If registering for more than one class, please send a separate cheque for each class and for each participant. For more details, call (416) 635-9550.

Dan Ronen named Eggleton's liaison with Jewish community

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Metro lawyer has been named special assistant for Jewish community affairs to federal Treasury Board president Art Eggleton.

The non-paying position requires Ronen, 30, to keep Eggleton apprised of the community's concerns and priorities.

Eggleton, who served as Toronto's mayor for 11 years before being hand-picked by Jean Chretien to seek a federal seat, represents the Metro riding of York Centre, in which Jews comprise nearly 20 per cent of the population.

The riding, formerly held by Robert Kaplan, includes the Bathurst Street corridor from Highway 401 north to Steeles Avenue.

As mayor, Eggleton was a visible presence on the Jewish scene. He took part in rallies for Soviet Jewry and visited Israel, as well as the site of the Auschwitz death camp in Poland.

"I am interested in the same issues my constituents are interested in ... war crimes, hate propaganda, Canada-Israel relations and the security of Israel," Eggleton told The CJN in explaining why he needs Jewish eyes and ears in and around his riding.

"Notwithstanding all the good words, these issues require more attention than they are getting."

According to Ronen, Eggleton "has a genuine interest in the Jewish community and an affection for it. There's a high percentage of Holocaust survivors in his riding. And he wants to be informed."

As Treasury Board president, Eggleton, 50, controls the country's purse strings. He's also infrastructure minister and is seen as a powerful member of Chretien's inner circle.

By keeping Eggleton informed of the community's concerns, Ronen feels he will also ensure that the cabinet is up to speed when it comes to Jewish matters.

Ronen said he's already received a number of calls from the public expressing dismay at the recent Supreme Court of Canada ruling that Imre Finta will not be retried for alleged war crimes.

Ronen said he has "regular and direct" contact with Eggleton. Among Ronen's duties will be to alert the minister to community rallies, especially around Yom Hashoah and Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Ronen feels one reason he was chosen for the position is that he is not presently affiliated with any of the major organizations in the community, namely, Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith or the Canada-Israel Committee.

Instead, his background has been in the North American Jewish Students Network, where he served as chair of Network's central region, and later as its president.

Role of media topic of forum

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "To get the truth is not entirely the media's responsibility," Lorrie Goldstein, associate editor of the Toronto Sun, said at a St. Lawrence Centre Forum recently.

Goldstein was one of a panel of media representatives discussing whether the media escalate conflict and whether they have a responsibility to diffuse conflict.

He was responding to a questioner's comment that the media have presented a biased view of events in Bosnia in the former Yugoslavia.

"It depends on whose ox is being gored," Goldstein said. "Somebody's truth is somebody else's propaganda."

He used as an illustration the separate visits he has had from representatives of the Jewish and Arab communities in Toronto. "I wish I could put them in the same room together; their issues are a mirror image of each other. It depends on what side you are on."

'Libel chill'

"I don't think my job is to solve disputes," said Christopher Thomas, host of CBC's Radio Noon.

Thomas said "libel chill" was a more serious factor in influencing news coverage than pressure from advertisers.

In answer to a comment from the audience that business has an inordinate influence on the media, Goldstein replied, "I'm not in social work, maybe some of the other panelists are. I'm in business to make some money and If I can do some good along the way, okay."

He criticized some sections of the media for asking Canadians what they think on issues, and then blasting their opinions. "I don't think the 53 per cent of Canadians who think immigration levels are too high should be called intolerant."

Other panelists were Victor Malarek, host of CBC's Fifth Estate; Lorna Simms, editor of Dawn, a newspaper on black culture; and Elizabeth Flynn, Association for Media Literacy. Zuhair Kashmeri, a senior editor at Now magazine, was moderator. The Society for Conflict Resolution and the Association for Media Literacy were co-sponsors.

JERUSALEM PAVILION PREPARATIONS

Violence casts pall over Yom Hashoah

United Nations accused of hypocrisy

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Recent acts of violence in Israel cast a shadow over last week's community Holocaust remembrance program held at the Pride of Israel Synagogue.

"Our foes today are even less predictable than those of half a century ago," charged Sabina Citron, founding member of the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association (CHRA), the group which sponsored the event.

"Why is the PLO covenant, which still speaks of the destruction of Israel, still in place?" Citron asked. "Could it be we are so blinded by our hope for peace that we do not see the attempt to rewrite history and delegitimize the State of Israel?"

The PLO cannot "have it both ways," said Citron. "They cannot pretend to negotiate peace with Israel while having an agreement with Hamas and other organizations still sworn to the destruction of the Jewish state. There is something terribly evil going on here. It's time for us to stare the truth in the face before Israel is dismantled piece by piece. Perhaps it is time to take a serious second look at the so-called peace process."

Referring to Palestinian attacks said to be in revenge for Kach extremist Baruch Goldstein's Feb. 25 massacre in Hebron, Citron asserted that [Arabs have already] "bludgeoned and inflicted 1,000 deaths on Baruch Goldstein.

"What more do they want?" she asked. "If the Arabs believe in collective guilt and revenge, then they are ironically acknowledging that Baruch Goldstein may have been justified in taking revenge for his friends who were brutally murdered."

Citron accused the United Nations Security Council of "perfidy," "hypocrisy" and a "double standard" for its attitude toward Israel following the Hebron attack. "Perhaps the UN Security Council should now be challenged to condemn Hamas and the international community should declare such terrorism a danger to world peace and peaceful co-existence."

She also had strong words about Canada, "which sees itself as a model of moderation and protector of human rights.

"[Canadian courts ignore] existing laws dealing with war crimes and crimes against humanity, [and have] for several decades now," Citron stated.

Dan Ronen, recently appointed special assistant for Jewish community affairs to MP Art Eggleton, said that the recent Supreme Court decision in the Imre Finta trial is "not a bar to criminal prosecutions." Eggleton "is unrelenting in his efforts to ensure that all Nazi war criminals living in Canada are brought to justice," Ronen said, adding that Eggleton has taken up the issue with Justice Minister Allan Rock on numerous occasions.

Ronen also expressed Eggleton's condemnation of last week's terrorist attacks in Israel and his call to "all parties at the negotiating table to disassociate themselves [from those acts] and to condemn them."

"Israel stands for the belief that the Holocaust will never happen again," said Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich of Pride of Israel. It also stands for courage, strength, bravery and power, he said.

"Every day that a Jew breathes, every bar or bat mitzvah every mitzvah done" serves as punishment for the Nazis, said the rabbi. He called the Holocaust a "grim lesson."

The legacy of the six million Jews who perished in the Holocaust, among them 1½ million children, is that we must continue to learn about the history of the time, said Haim Waxman, vice-consul of Israel. "We must fight those who try to say the Holocaust did not exist. We should fight anti-Semitism and neo-Nazism. We should not be silent and complacent when we see wrongs being done to others. We should stay united and remember we are one people with a common destiny."

Forty-six years after the establishment of the State of Israel, "Jewish blood is still being shed," said Waxman, "this time not by Nazis but by terrorists who wish to kill every possible chance for peace in the Middle East, but we shall not be deterred from our chosen path. In spite of all the attempts made by our enemies, we will continue in our struggle for peace with our neighbors, and this peace will come.

"We will continue to build a prosperous economy, a vital society and a Jewish culture," Waxman said. "This is our answer to the Nazis. This is our answer to all our enemies throughout the ages. Am Yisrael Chai."

Arnold Friedman, CHRA chair, stressed the importance of educating Jewish children about the Holocaust in his concluding remarks.

Other participants in the program included Cantor Joseph Cooper of Beth Tzedec Synagogue and the Associated Hebrew Schools choir under the direction of Yehuda Gilden. Six Holocaust survivors and their families lit memorial candles: Dave Wiener, Vera Waldman, Rose Ehrenworth, Esther Frieberg, Mike Englishman and Mendel Apelowicz.

Memorial candles were lit by Holocaust survivors and their families at last week's Yom Hashoah service at Pride of Israel Synagogue.

Canadian baseball great 'Goody' Rosen dies at 81

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Goodwin "Goody" Rosen, perhaps the best baseball player produced in Canada, died last week at age 81.

Rosen, an all-star centre-fielder with the Brooklyn Dodgers, grew up playing sandlot baseball with the "Lizzies" playground team, coached by Bob Abate.

He began his trek to the major leagues with numerous stops in obscure minor league towns, often encountering hostility from anti-Semitic ball players along the way, recalls Mickey Firestone, a longtime friend of Rosen's.

He played in the American Association with Louisville as well as in Arkansas after stints with Toronto Maple Leafs and Montreal Royals of the International League.

In 1937, he joined the Dodgers and played 22 games, driving in six runs and averaging .312.

He was leadoff man with the Leo Durocher-managed Dodgers until 1939 and rejoined them again in 1944, spending much of the intervening period in Syracuse.

In 1945 he batted .325 in 145 games, including 197 hits and 75 ribbies, but the next year he was traded to New York Giants.

He closed out his major league career with a 22-home run, .291 season. In his six seasons in the big leagues, Rosen compiled a .291 average in 551 games.

On his return to Toronto, he entered the restaurant business and was later a salesman for a tire company.

"Goody Rosen was one of the greatest Lizzies athletes of all time," said Mort Greenberg, himself a Lizzies alumnus. "He was the best Jewish boy from Canada to ever make the major leagues."

Greenberg remembers Rosen's "tenacity. He would not be deterred from his goal of playing in the majors."

Firestone said that even after Rosen had retired from baseball, his competitive fire did not ebb. "He was good in every sport," Firestone recalled.

He and Rosen were members of the Maple Downs Golf & Country Club for 38 years and often vied for the honor of club champion (each was able to win the title).

"He was a competitor, a hard worker and very opinionated about old-time ball," Firestone said. "He thought the present-day players didn't measure up to the old timers."

During his stint with the Dodgers, Rosen met Babe Ruth, the team's first base coach. He was also known as Ruth's "humidor," because he would hold Ruth's cigars for him in his suit jacket.

Book focuses on teenagers' emotions during march

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Of all the Holocaust education programs created in recent years, the March of the Living has to be one of the most dramatic.

Since its inception in 1988, thousands of teenagers from all over the world have made a biennial pilgrimage to Poland, to better understand the horrors of those places barren of life and seemingly of hope.

The trip concludes with a visit to Israel for Yom Ha'atzmaut, the joy of that day an antidote, at least somewhat, to the sadness of Auschwitz and Majdanek.

To those who suggest — or fear — that the March of the Living is merely an excuse for teenagers to get out of school, or that it trivializes what happened, I recommend For You Who Died I must Live On...Reflections on the March of the Living, edited by Toronto's Eli Rubenstein of United Israel Appeal (Mosaic Press, 1993), winner of the 1994 Canadian Jewish Book Award.

Subtitled Contemporary Jewish Youth Confront the Holocaust, it is impossible to read more than a page or two without wiping away tears.

Youngsters on the 1992 March, which also commemorated the 50th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, share their pain and sorrow, in poems, short essays, photographs and sketches.

The photographs have become almost traditional; the youngsters wrapped in the Israeli flag walking along the train tracks leading to the camps and crematoria, comforting each other, lighting candles.

What I found most moving were those of teenagers alone in the crowd, surrounded by others, but with suddenly adult, pain-wracked eyes. Or the young, unidentified girl huddled alone in the middle of a now-empty field.

The stories tell what happened — the marches, the prayers, the unexpected kindnesses, the even-more unexpected anti-Semitism, The silence. Warren Levitan, 17, of Montreal, writes "We are four thousand long, four thousand strong...I cannot see the end of the blue and white sea. The colors of Israel. The colors of the talit. ...I want to sing 'Am Yisrael Chai,' but we are silent."

Sharon Feder of Vancouver, also 17, writes how she felt after seeing the piles of shoes at Majdanek.

"You fall on your knees and reach out, out towards the shoes. You cry, you yell and yet you cannot reach them...You search desperately for those who filled them, but they are nowhere: it is hopeless. You stand and walk out leaving a piece of you behind.

"Have you heard enough? Well, this is just the beginning."

Toronto's Lisa Grushcow, 15, describes in poetry how the march affected her even after she returned home: "it is only now/in Canada/that i leave my room at night/and stand sobbing by a tree...that Auschwitz begins to seep through/the glass/guides/grass;/it seeps in torrents."

They describe the cheering as the plane landed in Jerusalem, the emotional visit to the Western Wall, now with renewed appreciation for its meaning, and for the symbol of hope that the state of Israel is, whatever its problems.

Dara Horn, 15, of Short Hills, New Jersey, describes planting a tree on Yom Hazikaron, the Israeli Remembrance Day, promising that "this tree will live as long as a tree ever can, even when there is no longer such a thing as a tree or a person that looks away when someone cries for help. This tree will never turn away."

The March of the Living was designed not only to stand witness to the truth of the Holocaust, but also to affirm that Hitler did not win — that whatever was done to us, the Jewish people have survived.

The teenagers on the March understood that. This book makes the reader understand that too.

Family Matters

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

Spouses in debt: can they take your house? (first of two parts)

On February 21, 1994, panic gripped many lawyers, accountants, and other self-employed professionals. The Toronto Star published an article which inaccurately indicated that in Ontario, creditors could seize a debtor's home even if it was registered solely in his or her spouse's name. Fortunately, the paper published a correction on February 25, 1994. However, the number of calls professionals received over the issue suggested that many may not have seen the retraction, or were confused.

In any event, the following explains some established principles and laws in this province as developed by the Legislature and how the Judges have now interpreted the Ontario Family Law Act and our debtor-creditor laws.

1. If a house is registered in the name of both spouses, either as "joint tenants" or "tenants in common", creditors who succeed in obtaining a judgement against one of the spouses (or the Trustee of a bankrupt spouse on behalf of such creditors) can force a sale of the house and seize the debtor spouse's share of the equity. (By equity I mean this spouse's half-share of the sale proceeds minus the mortgages, other liens against title, real estate commissions, and lawyers' fees to close the sale).

2. If the matrimonial home is registered solely in the name of the non-debtor spouse (usually the wife), then in most cases the debtor spouse's creditors cannot have the house sold nor seize any part of the equity. On separation (or the wife's death), the husband may have a right to make a claim for a payment from the wife (or her estate). That payment could equal half of the matrimonial home's equity. (Sometimes, the husband's business or other assets are worth the same as, or more than, the "wife's" home, so that no such payment is available). However, the Courts have decided that the right to such a possible "equalization payment" that might be available on marital separation or death is not the type of legal right that can be seized by creditors.

However, there are some important exceptions to the above principles. In my next column I'll examine a few circumstances in which you might, indeed, lose the roof over your head.

Torontonian recalls martyrs of Holocaust at Halifax service

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — The audience was silent as it listened to Toronto's Max Eisen trace the brief but interminable time he spent in German war camps during World War II.

Tears appeared when Eisen told of the horrors he experienced as a displaced Czechoslovakian who became part of the Nazi's purge of Hungary in 1944.

Speaking at Yom Hashoah 1994 in Halifax, Eisen admitted his was only one story of survival. But he said, "Our martyrs left us with hope and trust. We are a link to the past — now and for the future."

His speech was part of an evening of remembrance presented by the Atlantic Jewish Council at Shaar Shalom Synagogue.

More than 150 people saw a slide/music presentation highlighting the March of the Living 1990 and 1992. Four of the 18 Atlantic Canadian teens on the 1994 March spoke to the audience by telephone hook-up. Six candles were lit to honor the six million who died in the Holocaust, the last one by survivor Dr. Laszlo Fried of Halifax.

Eisen, now 64, and with twin sons carrying on a manufacturing business he started in Toronto in the early 1950s, spent two busy days in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

He addressed more than 1,000 students at Fredericton High School April 6, "the biggest crowd I ever spoke to," he said. The next day, he met with 300 students at Halifax's J. L. Ilsley High and on the morning of his April 8 departure, he talked to 3,000 more students at three other Halifax schools.

"Holocaust Memorial Days are held to remind you, and me, that our forefathers gave us strength to build a new generation out of their ashes, with a new vigor," he said.

Eisen suffered with little or no food

In his Yom Hashoah commemoration speech, Eisen said his small community of 40 Jewish families lived a peaceful life until 1939. "Then [after the partition of Czechoslovakia] it became problematic overnight," he said.

After several years of persecution, his family was sent to Auschwitz in March 1944 and separated. "It was the last time I saw my grandparents, mother, two brothers, sister and aunt," he said.

He remained with his father and uncle, and worked as a slave laborer with them until October 1944, when they, too, were taken from him. "I then knew I was on my own," he recalled.

Until liberation in May 1945, he suffered with little or no food, clothes unfit for the cold Polish winter and inhumane living conditions. Then freedom came.

"I returned to my home town in Slovakia but someone was living in my house and I was not welcomed, even in my home town. I went to Marienbad, outside of Prague, where I finally got a job, apprenticing as a dental technician."

By 1948, when the Communists took over Czechoslovakia, "we knew we had to get out," but Eisen, then 19, faced many barriers when he tried to leave the country.

"Canada made all sorts of excuses why Jews should not be admitted," he said, but he was finally given a visa in 1949. "When I came down the St. Lawrence (River) into Quebec City, I was the happiest person in the world, to arrive in this wonderful land."

He said he and 45 other Torontonian survivors speak to schools and community groups about the Holocaust "so the lesson can be learned that this kind of human behavior holds no place in society."

Eisen was brought to Halifax by the Canadian Jewish Congress Holocaust Remembrance Committee's Holocaust Sensitization Program, with the assistance of Canada's Heritage Ministry.

Short term set for work/study

NEW YORK — Livnot U'Lehibanot (To Build and To Be Built), the 14-year-old work/study program in Israel, will now be offering a short version of its successful three-month program.

Three-week sessions will begin May 29, June 27 and July 24. With campuses in the mountain top city of Tzfat and historical Jerusalem, Livnot will also continue to offer its traditional three-month program; the next one begins June 5.

Both programs include the study of Judaism in an open and questioning atmosphere in daily classes taught in English. Participants also work in the community, restoring and rebuilding the land and doing community service work. There are numerous hikes throughout Israel. Time is spent in both Jerusalem and Tzfat.

Participants in all programs are men and women ages 21-30 with minimal Jewish background. For more information, call (212) 752-2390 or write Livnot L'Lehibanot, 110 East 59th St., 3rd floor, NY, NY 10022.

Multitude of Orthodox women's roles to be examined at seminar

TORONTO — The many roles played by today's Jewish woman — daughter, mother, wife and her own person — will be the subject of an all-day seminar sponsored by the Orthodox Outreach Program of Jewish Family & Child Service and Beth Avraham Yoseph, B'nai Torah and Clanton Park Synagogues.

The event will be held at Baycrest Terrace, 55 Ameer, in North York, on Sunday, April 24, from 9:45 a.m. until 4 p.m.

Specially trained Orthodox facilitators will lead programs dealing with such matters as communication; juggling "superwoman" roles (including stress management); parenting teens, children and large families; the single, Orthodox woman; and caring for parents while being responsible for children, husband and home.

Selma Elzas, who is working on this program through JF&CS told The CJN that for the past several years JF&CS has been training Orthodox facilitators to work with their own community, where many find it difficult to access regular programs of the agency. "Because they (the facilitators) are part of that community, they will have more credibility," Elzas said.

The purpose of the Orthodox Outreach Program, as of JF&CS in general, is to strengthen family life.

The program, she said, is endorsed by the Vaad Harabonim, and especially by Rabbi Yitzchak Kerzner, Rabbi Akiva Stefansky of Beth Jacob High School, Rabbi Moshe Lowy of Agudah and Rabbi Jacob Hirshman of Kollel Avreichim. They all, she said, took an active part in training the facilitators.

Rabbi Kerzner will be presenting the opening remarks at the seminar; Rabbi Raphael Marcus of B'nai Torah will be giving the closing comments; and Beth Avraham Yoseph's Rabbi Baruch Taub will be the luncheon speaker.

Cost for the day is $15, which includes lunch. For more information or to register, contact Selma Elzas, (416)638-7800, ext. 799.

Women to look at Shoah's legacy

TORONTO — On the 51st anniversary of the uprising in the Warsaw ghetto, the Jewish Feminist Anti-Fascist League is dedicating an evening, Tuesday, April 19, to the legacy of the Holocaust. It will focus on Jewish women's responses to the Holocaust, as survivors, as victims, as children of survivors and as anti-fascist activists today.

The theme of the evening is how women resisted, how women died, how women survived, and how women remember.

There will be a slide presentation by Jewish photographer and resistance fighter Faye Schulman, who managed to hide copies of photographs she was forced to take by the Nazis. There will also be songs by Batsheva, readings, poetry, music and visual art. Links will be made between the Holocaust and fascism today.

The event takes place at the Jewish Community Centre, corner of Bloor and Spadina, at 7:00 p.m.; doors open at 6:30 p.m. Wheel chair accessible and child care provided. For more information call Ellen, 926-0499.

Author explores roots of racism in Toronto

Too Good To Be True — Toronto in the 1920s by Randall White

Racism and intolerance have a relatively long history in Toronto. Individual acts of violence against minorities and government policies to restrict immigration of many ethnic groups are on public record. We recognize that these belong to this city's and Canada's past.

Episodes of the legacy are outlined as part of a general retrospective in a new book by political scientist, Randall White, entitled Too Good To Be True — Toronto in the 1920's. A policy consultant with the Ontario government, White has previously authored books about free trade, Senate reform and Ontario's economic development.

The latest work represents a personal departure from White's other writings, a project he has researched for over four years. It chronicles an era that many believe was one of the most turbulent in this century.

The "Roaring 20s" in Toronto were a time of economic boom and bust, of temperance and tempers, of raised expectations and crushing poverty, of a growing multicultural character and blatant bigotry. White looks at both the good and the bad, drawing parallels with the 1990s.

White recounts the circumstances leading up to the infamous Chinese Immigration Act of 1923, legislation that effectively halted the influx of Asian immigration that had begun in the mid-1800s. By extension, the act was also a signal to others that Canada was not putting out the welcome mat for newcomers.

The book says that in 1921, Toronto's Jewish population was almost 35,000, or about seven per cent of the city's total inhabitants. Never again would the Jewish community carry such relative demographic weight here.

Legislation of the day limited the number of Jews emigrating to Canada from Eastern Europe. Pogroms, massacres, persecutions, fascism and Nazism notwithstanding, Jews were particularly singled out as persona non grata in this country.

Even in booming economic times, Toronto was not overly hospitable to Jews and visible minorities; the gathering storm clouds heralding the Great Depression only made matters worse.

As the 1920s drew to a spluttering conclusion, White explains, the new-community Jews from Eastern Europe were the most numerous and obvious representatives of the more diverse local society that had begun to show its face in the early twentieth century.

"And anti-Semitism in Toronto was mixed in with events happening across the ocean. We were not immune to the Nazi neurosis that was tightening its grip on Germany," says White.

In his book, he details one of the most violent incidents of anti-Semitism that ever occured in this city. Started by a group known as the Balmy Beach Swastika Club in the east-end Beaches, the incident climaxed with a riot at Christie Pits, close to the home turf of many new-community Jews.

At a baseball game between Jewish and non-Jewish teams, a swastika sign with the motto "Hail Hitler" appeared among the spectators. After the game, groups of Gentile youths declared that Jews were not allowed at Christie Pits.

A few days later a similar incident again took place at the Pits. This time both Gentile and Jewish youths were organized, with baseball bats and lead pipes. A full-scale riot broke out, lasting six hours and spreading to neighboring streets. Although the violence gradually diminished, the riot left real scars that would last for many years.

"The early August 1933 riot at Christie Pits had some obvious echoes in what may or may not have been a different kind of Toronto race riot in early May 1992," White observes.

Despite this, White is optimistic about the future. "As Toronto evolves into an ever more cosmopolitian city, I believe that avowed racists will find less of a following. We are already witnessing this through increased dialogue between and among racial and ethnic communities here."

There will likely always be flare-ups of racial tension to varying degrees in Toronto. But, according to White, the spirit of "Toronto the Good" that had its roots in the 1920s, continues to develop today and will become more manifest as we mature as a society.

Baycrest spring sale planned

TORONTO — One sure sign that spring has arrived is the annual Spring Sale organized by the Women's Auxiliary of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. All proceeds raised at this event go to support Alzheimer's research at Baycrest Centre.

This year the gigantic sale of new merchandise will take place on Thursday, April 21, 1994 from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. on the ground floor of Baycrest Hospital (Ben and Hilda Katz Building), 3560 Bathurst Street, north of Lawrence Avenue.

The Spring Sale will feature a mini-drug store with items donated by some Shoppers' Drug Mart suppliers, including non-prescription medicines, cosmetics, toiletries, foodstuffs and household supplies. Shoppers will also be able to take part in a silent auction featuring more than 200 items, ranging in value from $25 to $2,500. The auction includes a variety of brand new merchandise.

For more information, please call the Women's Auxiliary at 789-7071.

All for One Society determined to survive

TORONTO — They may have only 40 members, but after six decades, this society is determined to survive.

The All For One Mutual Benefit Society celebrates its 60th birthday this year. Even though the heart beats more slowly, it is still ticking, and there's a lot of heart left among All For One members.

The Society's annual United Jewish Appeal contribution has been a given each year since UJA began. So are donations to dozens of other charities. In fact, these days, tzedakah is pretty well what All For One is all about.

Ten-term president Morris Baker loves to list the Society's beneficiaries.

"We give to UJA and to Jewish Family & Child Service. We adopt a child every year in Israel. We participate in Holocaust Week and Yom Ha'atzmaut . . ."

All For One was founded during the heyday of Toronto societies. According to Ontario Jewish Archives director, Stephen Speisman, they began blossoming in the 1920s and 30s.

"The Jewish population had increased quite significantly and felt that synagogues didn't meet their needs," he says.

All For One offered its 250 members free visits to the doctor, sick benefits and even, for a short time, a credit union, which was disbanded under the glare of a society scandal.

"Somebody got $80 without the credit union's okay," remembers veteran member Saul Shoom. "As a matter of fact, I don't think we ever got it back."

All For One activities these days are restricted to events centred on Jewish holidays. It's tough to schedule speakers for educational programs because so many members spend so much time in Florida.

The All For One Society is struggling against not only a dwindling membership but a dying one. "There are no young members. The average age is in the 60s and 70s," Shoom admits. After a long pause, Shoom remembers that "there is a young fellow under 50."

According to United Jewish Appeal records, over 30 societies, like All For One, are still significant tzedakah donors despite diminishing numbers.

Speisman estimates the youngest society is about 40 years old, because "by the end of the 50s new ones were not being formed."

Strengthened by their charitable instincts, societies such as All For One are determined to continue operating as long as their members want them to.

Saul Shoom sums up the All For One philosophy. "We survive and the members enjoy, and as long as they enjoy we'll carry on."

A LEGO FLAG FOR ISRAEL'S BIRTHDAY

A giant Israeli flag made of Lego blocks will be one of the highlights of the country's 46th Independence Day celebration, which falls on April 14. It will be built from 350,000 blocks and is expected to raise $700,000 for Nitzan, an organization that assists children and adults with learning disabilities. The first block was put in place in Jerusalem by President Ezer Weizman and Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin will lay the last block on Independence Day. The flag will measure 18 by 13 feet when complete.

Israeli culture thriving

Robust body of literature has evolved

Jerusalem Dateline

If the heartbeat of a nation's culture lies in the written word, then Israel's is beating strong.

Following the revival of Hebrew as a spoken language late last century, a lively, articulate and robust body of literature has evolved.

The giants of modern Hebrew — Bialik, Tchernikhovsky, Brenner, Agnon (who won Israel's only Nobel Prize, that for literature, in 1966) — have been supplemented by an increasing number of local-born writers whose works stand up to the best contemporary authors.

One of Israel's most famous sons is Amos Oz. Others are Haim Gouri, Moshe Shamir, S. Yizhar, Benjamin Tammuz and Hanoch Bar Tov, all members of the so-called Palmach Generation, a prolific group named after the pre-State fighting elite.

In the last 15 years, Sephardi writers influenced by Arabic — Samy Michael, Amnon Shamost and Dan Benaya — have matured into recognition. Writers like Aharon Appelfeld, Abba Kovner use the leitmotif of the Holocaust in their writings.

The centre ground in Israeli writing today is held by those who came to literary maturity after the War of Independence, and whose literary vision was tempered through the fires of austerity, absorption and four wars of survival. Such writers include A.B. Yehoshua, Shulamit Lapid, Meir Shalev, David Grossman, Shulamith Hareven, and many others. A younger generation of writers, including many women — Yehudit Katzir and Orly Castel-Bloom — is exploring more universal literary themes.

Poetry holds a special place in Israel's literary life. New works by Yehuda Amichai, Dahlia Ravikovich or T. Carmi, among others, are always avidly awaited.

The musical life of Israel is a constant influx of immigrant musicians and an outflow of performers who have reached the highest international peaks. Yitzhak Perlman, Pinhas Zukerman, Shlomo Mintz and Daniel Barenboim all received their training in Israel and went on to glittering careers on the world's concert stages. Israel's orchestras, including the Israel Philharmonic, the Jerusalem Symphony, the Beersheba Sinfonietta and many chamber groups, many of them made up of musicians from the former Soviet Union, have provided a home for hundreds of players.

Israel hosts a series of international music events, including the Arthur Rubinstein Piano Competition, the Pablo Casals Cello Competition, a triennial international harp contest, the Zimriya choirs festival, and annual music festivals in Jerusalem, Kibbutz Ein Hashofet and, notably, at Kibbutz Ein Gev on the shores of the Sea of Galilee.

New generation of ethnic singers have boosted Sephardi pride

For all this wealth of musical life, it is not only the highbrow that is catered to. Rockers, popsters and balladeers are there in force. Moshe Wilensky, Yoram Taharlev, Nurit Hirsch, Sasha Argov and, above all, Naomi Shemer, write music that is played on radio, on television, in kindergartens and in sunshine-home singsongs from Metulla to Eilat.

Pop superstars in Israel include Ofra Haza, Yehoram Gaon, Arik Einstein, Shalom Hanoch and many more. A new generation of ethnic singers such as Boaz Shar'abi, Chaim Moshe, Itzik Gala and the Breira Hativit group have given a new sense of ethnic pride to young Israelis of Sephardi background.

Israel owes its place in the world of dance to three women.

The first was a Russian-trained ballerina, Rina Nikova. Nikova created a local art form incorporating themes from the Bible, Middle East dance tradition, folk dance and Russian classical ballet.

The second, Sarah Levi-Tanai, harnessed the Yemenite dance tradition, one of the richest and most exotic dance cultures of the Middle East, and created the Inbal Dance Theatre.

The third, Baroness Bethsabee de Rothschild, founded the Batsheva and Bat Dor dance companies. Both are the leading exponents of modern dance in israel.

In recent years, these companies have been joined by the Kibbutz Dance Company and the Israel Ballet, the country's only classical ballet company, as well as Kol Demama (Voice of Silence). The latter group comprises deaf and hard-of-hearing dancers. Their performances are electrifying.

Folk dance groups abound throughout the country. Outstanding among them is Hora Yerushalayim, a Jerusalem-based group with four companies divided by age.

Israeli theatre owes its origins to the first Hebrew theatre in the world, Habimah, founded in Moscow in 1917, and which moved to Palestine in 1931. Since then, theatre has come a long way in style, presentation method, and especially content.

Of all the arts in Israel, theatre is perhaps the most socially involved, with a new generation of playwrights such as Hanoch Levine, Hillel Mittelpunkt and Yehushua Sobol breaking taboos, tackling controversial topics, and attempting to act as the mirror and conscience of society.

The major repertory theatres, such as the Habimah, Cameri, Ohel, Haifa and Beersheba Municipal Theatres and the Jerusalem Khan, have heavily attended subscription series. Great popular success has attended an annual theatrical innovation, the Festival of Alternative Theatre in Acre.

Israeli art combines two factors: a classical European tradition brought by the country's early painters and art teachers overlaid by the influence of the special light and the natural attributes of the country.

In the space of nearly 90 years, since the establishment of the Bezalel Academy of Art in Jerusalem in 1906, a unique Israeli visual art has been created.

Social realism

Israeli artists have experimented with everything from expressionism to cubism, from Russian social realism to environmental and performance art. Among contemporary Israeli artists who have managed to make the quantam leap from local to universal recognition are Ya'acov Agam (whose kinetic room at the Pompidou Center in Paris is a seminal work), Menashe Kadishman, Avigdor Arikha, and Avigdor Stematsky.

Two sculptors, Dany Karavan and Ygael Tumarkin, are well-known abroad, and their work can be seen all over Israel. Marcel Janco (1895-1984), founder of the Dadaist movement; Reuven Rubin (1893-1974) with his lyrical large-scale canvases; and Anna Ticho (1894-1980) with her exquisite drawings and washes of her beloved Jerusalem hills, have also gained a major international following.

Hebrew's literary renaissance

Jerusalem Dateline

Author Amos Oz and poet Yehuda Amichai are, in a sense, Israel's most successful ambassadors: what they have to say about the country is translated, respectively, into 24 and 22 languages and permeates the hearts and minds of people worldwide.

Through the work of writers like Oz and Amichai, millions of readers have been introduced to the culture of a tiny country in the Middle East.

Hebrew, with four million speakers in Israel, is now experiencing an upsurge in poetry, prose and playwriting comparable to the renaissance of the English language during the Elizabethan period. Israel publishes an estimated 10,000 new poems annually in books, literary magazines and newspapers.

Many people consider the revival of Hebrew as a spoken language after an interval of 1,700 years a miraculous process. It is hard to think of another instance of a literary language developing into a spoken one.

Although Hebrew has been used continually by Jews since biblical times over a period of 3,000 years, by the late 19th century it was mainly the language of study and prayer. Used for religious and ritual purposes, it had long ceased to be spoken, having been replaced either by the languages of the countries of the Diaspora in which the Jews found themselves, or by composite Jewish languages such as Ladino or Yiddish.

During the period of the Jewish Enlightenment, or the haskala (1781-1881), when Yiddish was still the lingua franca of Eastern European Jewry, Hebrew was adopted as a means of creating the new enlightened Jewish culture.

Despite the Enlightenment, and despite the fact that all along Hebrew continued to be the language of family observances and communal festivities, of legal and commercial documents, of historical chronicles, municipal records and tombstone inscriptions, there were very few people speaking Hebrew, and even fewer writing Hebrew literature by the late 19th century.

It is popular to begin the story of the revival of Hebrew with the disembarkation of Eliezer Ben-Yehuda on the shores of Palestine in 1881. Born in 1858, Ben-Yehuda came to Israel with his family in 1881 and taught high school. Between 1894 and 1915 he wrote for and later served as editor of the leading newspapers of the day: Mevasseret Zion, Hahavezelet, HaZvi.

Poets played a role

Both in his private life and in his professional activities, Ben-Yehuda refused to speak anything but Hebrew. He established The Association for the Revival of Israel to promulgate Hebrew culture and was a founding member of the Va'ad HaLashon (The Committee for the Hebrew Language). He advocated simplicity and passion in the language and fought rhetoric and artifice.

For all Ben-Yehuda's zeal and perseverance, the revival of a language could not have been the work of one man alone. The Committee for the Hebrew Language was established in 1890 to guard the nascent, tender Hebrew tongue from foreign influences. Later, in the 20th century, it became responsible for coining words as the Hebrew Language Academy. To this day, committees established for the various branches of knowledge ensure the continued adjustment of Hebrew to modern reality.

Hebrew poets played a tremendous role in the revival of the language. H.N. Bialik (1873-1934) devoted endless energy and erudition to the gathering and editing of forgotten Hebrew sources. Shaul Tchernikhovsky (1875-1943) engaged in a parallel venture: the translation of European classics from antiquity to his time, from which Hebrew poetry had been severed in the ghetto centuries.

The impact of these poets was so great that by the 1920s, the centre of Jewish cultural activity had shifted from Odessa to Palestine in the space of 30 years. The activities of these poets constantly enlarged the vocabulary of Hebrew. It is no wonder that to this day, Israeli poets are in the vanguard of linguistic developments.

This January, 40 translators from 18 countries gathered in Jerusalem under the auspices of the Tel Aviv-based Institute for the Translation of Hebrew Literature to discuss problems relating specifically to translating Hebrew literature.

The meetings between Chinese, Japanese, Dutch, Serbian, Portuguese, Polish, Czech and Arabic translators and Israeli authors were stimulating; they attested to the extraordinary vitality and blossoming of the Hebrew language.

During this century of revival of Hebrew as a spoken language, it has shown surprising adaptability in coping with the challenges of the modern world. It is used effectively in all forms of personal and mass communication: the economy, the army, science, education, commerce, sports and all other spheres.

Aharon Megged, an Israeli novelist, has summed this up: "The revival of the Hebrew language is not like Lazarus rising from the dead. It is more like the Sleeping Beauty awakened by the prince. She is not dead: she has only been dormant for a long time."

Paintings, sculpture and weavings made at Jerusalem Elwyn's various art programs were exhibited and sold last winter at the Jerusalem Theatre in Israel.

Jerusalem Elwyn uses art to help handicapped express themselves

In her soul Ayala is an artist; in her thoughts she's a poet. "When I'm weaving I feel like I'm blossoming inside," she says softly.

Like other artists, Ayala wants people to enjoy her work; she also wants to be able to make a living from her weaving. Unlike other artists, however, Ayala is mentally handicapped For four years she has worked at the Millie Shime Centre of Jerusalem Elwyn, where, along with seven other clients of the centre, she weaves scarves and rugs using a complicated weaving loom.

Their products are sold at the centre and at some stores. All the artists receive a base salary plus a commission when one of their pieces is sold. Jerusalem Elwyn hopes that eventually its clients will be able to make their living solely from the sale of their work, but for now the salaries have to be subsidized.

The Philadelphia-based American Elwyn Association, which has been dealing with the mentally and physically disabled in the United States since 1852, established Jerusalem Elwyn by Israeli request almost ten years ago. Jerusalem Elwyn now serves over 710 clients from infants through adults in their numerous programs throughout the city. Programs include special education, an adult development centre, sheltered workshops, supported employment, vocational training, preschool programs, family counselling and outpatient diagonostic services.

Some people in the weaving workshop, such as Ayala and another 35-year old woman, are true artists who do embroidery and other crafts on their own at home, said Margalit Piller, the co-ordinator of rehabilitation services at Millie Shime, but most of the clients are in the workshop mainly because of their ability to work the loom, which requires hand and foot co-ordination.

The use of art — not only as work but also as therapy and as an enrichment activity — serves an important function at Jerusalem Elwyn. "It's part of the concept of individuality," says Avi Ramot, director of Jerusalem Elwyn. "If a person has artistic talent, and art is one of the things he loves, we give him a chance to do it."

For many of the clients at Jerusalem Elwyn, art is the one part of their lives over which they have total control. They can choose the colors they use, where to put the paint, the size and shape of the sculpture they make, and they can simply choose to work or not to work at any given time.

For many of the Jerusalem Elwyn clients who can't express themselves verbally, their sessions with an art therapist provide the outlet with which to communicate their problems — regardless of their artistic ability. The art therapy sessions often prove to be a catharsis for the clients, who are able to reveal past events or current problems to the therapist through their art work.

Ramot takes the role art can play in the lives of Jerusalem Elwyn's clients seriously. Hanging on a wall in front of his desk is a portrait drawn by a mentally disturbed woman. The woman in the painting seems just about to let out a horrific scream, and the colors are dark and the brush strokes harsh. But Ramot sees beauty in the picture. It is the first picture the woman drew which was not of skeletons and graveyards, and she gave it to him. "When I see this drawing I remember what a painting can reveal and what art can do for a person," he said.

Hamiltonians join JNF tour

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — The 37-strong Hamilton contingent of the recent Jewish Natonal Fund Mega Tour to Israel was "the largest, relatively" of all the Canadian groups, said the local Jerusalem emissary.

Yoram Gordon said the 37 Hamiltonians and 14 people from London and Windsor made up the largest group from southwestern Ontario ever. There were 330 Canadians on the tour.

The 12-day tour began in Tel Aviv and ended in Jerusalem.

There were a few highlights. Missy (Miriam) Morissa Cohen, daughter of Hamilton lawyer, Larry Cohen, had her bat mitzvah in the ancient synagogue on Masada.

The Cohen family group included Missy's grandparents Al and Pearl Cohen, brothers Joshua and Jonathan, and uncle Michael Cohen. Rabbi Bernard Baskin, rabbi emeritus of the Cohens' home congregation of Temple Anshe Sholom, officiated.

Fulfilled lifelong dream

At the tour's first Shabbat dinner at the Carlton Hotel in Tel Aviv, former Londoner Ralph Waldman, now living in Haifa, was honored for his lifelong dedication and hard work on behalf of JNF.

Known as "Mr. JNF" when he lived in London, Ont., Waldman was in his 80s when he fulfilled a lifelong dream several years ago by making aliyah.

For the southwest Ontario contingent the tour itinerary included the dedication of the Eilat-Canada Project, the backbone of a housing and park project.

The parks, said Gordon, are now almost complete.

Among the major donors to the project are Herb and Cece Schreiber of Burlington, who were Hamilton's 1991 Negev Dinner honorees.

Part of the project is Canada Gardens. The gardens were dedicated by Ruth Atkinson of London, Ont., on her third consecutive JNF tour to Israel. Atkinson, who is not Jewish, donated $105,000 towards them.

And for Dundas mayor John Addison, there was a special side trip to Afula, which is twinned with Dundas, and where he was entertained by the mayor.

JNF dedicates Alpert Lookout

TORONTO — The Jewish National Fund (JNF) has dedicated the Alpert Lookout at Tivon, Israel, in honor of Herbert and Patricia Alpert of Toronto.

Patricia is president of the Toronto JNF and a national vice-president of Hadassah WIZO Canada.

Tivon is a picturesque town overlooking the Jezreel Valley. The Lookout is an observation point at the edege of JNF's Shomrim Forest.

The dedication ceremony took place during the recent Mega Tour of Israel, an annual JNF trip. The Mayor of Tivon was a special guest and music was provided by local high school students.

The Alpert Lookout is one of a number of recent JNF projects beautifying the country and providing work for new immigrants.

The JNF has been developing and afforesting the land of Israel for 93 years.

Television series to focus on 11 of world's major faiths

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Though the Holocaust severely shook his faith in God, a leading Orthodox scholar from New York said his faith is now stronger and deeper than ever.

"No heart is so whole as a broken heart, and no faith so strong as a broken faith," Rabbi Irving Greenburg said in a half-hour interview to be shown on Vision TV Tuesday, April 19 at 10.30 p.m.

The interview with Rabbi Greenburg, president of the National Jewish Centre for Learning and Leadership, is part of the network's Faith in the First Person series, comprising 26 programs covering 11 of the world's major faiths.

To the question, "Where was God during the Holocaust?" Rabbi Greenburg replied: "God's agony over what happened must be beyond belief." Instead of criticizing God for his failure to stop the Holocaust, people should show "compassion" to God, he said.

The rabbi conceded that his own faith was shaken in 1961 when he was teaching American history in Israel and read accounts at Yad Vashem of the Holocaust. "My faith was shattered. There were days I couldn't believe what I was reading, I couldn't talk about it."

What particularly shook him, he said, were the accounts of the Nazis throwing children into burning pits to save the expense of killing them by other methods, and their decision to cut down on the amount of gas used in exterminating Jews, thus extending the agony of the victims. "And they did this, even though it was costing them only one-quarter of a cent per person for the gas. It cost only $6.75 for enough gas to kill 1,500 Jews.

EYE ON ARTS

Pianist Robert Silverman, who performs Beethoven's Piano Concerto No.5 (The Emperor) at Toronto's Roy Thompson Hall April 16 and 17, is sometimes referred to as "the dean of Canadian pianists."

Silverman has been well-received by audiences in New York, London, Sydney, Budapest, Kiev, St. Petersburg and Hong Kong. "Brilliant" and "transcendent" are how critics often describe his playing, which won a Juno Award in 1991.

A native of Montreal, Silverman played with that city's symphony orchestra at age 14. He studied engineering for three years and earned a humanities degree before re-embarking on his musical career.

"My parents, being concerned with my future, didn't become stage parents and push me into music," he says. However, the recognition and top awards he drew as a pianist ultimately robbed the world of an engineer.

Now living in Vancouver, he is director of the School of Music at the University of British Columbia, and has more than a dozen recordings to his credit. Several years ago, after a performance of Rachmaninoff in Thunder Bay, Silverman sold his encores to raise money for the symphony, eliciting $11,666 in pledges from the audience.

He has also participated in benefits for synagogues and charities in Vancouver.

"I feel very conscious of being part of the Jewish community. I've always helped them when they've come to me." Silverman has performed often in Toronto, but never before at Roy Thomson Hall.

For his debut there, he performs the Emperor Concerto with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. The concert also includes selections from Wagner, Barber and R. Strauss.

Tickets, $19 to $46, are available from the Roy Thomson box office (416) 593-4828.

A Shayna Maidel: Janese Kane, artistic producer of the upcoming A Shayna Maidel, began performing on radio and stage at age 13 in her native South Africa, and gained more theatrical experience after she came to Canada.

For years, she worked in the business world, then returned to the stage about eight years ago, trying her hand at producing and acting.

"This is the largest production I have ever worked on," she says of A Shayna Maidel, which opens at the North York Performing Arts Centre April 20.

An off-Broadway original, the play (by Barbara Lebow) deals with the reunion of two sisters in New York City after World War II. It contains some Yiddishisms but is almost entirely in English. It has seen successful runs in Israel, Belgium, Australia and the United States — more than 300 productions in all.

"Toronto is a major theatre centre and this is something that we absolutely deserve here," says Kane. Directed by Al Waxman, the Toronto production features Shannon Lawson and Sharon Bernbaum as the two sisters and Harvey Atkin as Mordechai. It is by far the most ambitious project undertaken by Kane's not-for-profit New Globe Theatre.

"Our object is not to make money but to put on good theatre," she says.

Happiness is seeing FIDDLER ON THE ROOF. The world acclaimed musical is as heartwarming now as it was 30 years ago. Maybe better, because now we know & love all the songs that Tevye (Gerry Salsberg) and all the other 31 fine actors sing so marvelously. Enjoy it Sat. thru Thurs. at Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St., 630-6752.

To smoke or not to smoke. It's a decision all children must make. And, given the daily pressures of fitting in, it's by no means an easy one. But just because they must decide for themselves doesn't mean they have to be on their own.

Talk to your kids. Point out that tobacco is a major cause of lung disease, heart disease and cancer. Every year in Ontario, it costs us 13,000 loved ones – most of whom got hooked in their teens. It also costs us all $3 billion a year in such things as health care and lost work time.

It's a perfect time to share these ideas. Because right now your children are seeing and hearing a province-wide anti-smoking campaign. So you can bet it's on their minds. But of all the messages they receive, none will deliver more impact than yours.

To prepare for your talk, call for this booklet. Encourage your children. Give them the confidence they need to make the right choice. And you'll have been there for them after all.

How We Die by Sherwin B. Nuland (Random House $31.50)

"Whoever has lived long enough to find out what life is, knows how deep a debt of gratitude we owe to Adam, the first great benefactor of our race. He brought death into the world." These sentiments of Mark Twain are not widely shared. Most persons, no matter how old, believe that they can live at least one more year. When George Burns in his early nineties was asked how he regarded death, he responded, "I don't believe in it."

Sherwin Nuland, a Yale University Professor of Medicine, doesn't regard the physical process of dying with equanimity. He asserts that it is usually "a messy business" and that, if we know the truth about how we die, we can rid ourselves of both our fears and our false expectations. He writes, "Only by a frank discussion of the very details of dying can we best deal with those aspects that frighten us the worst." By becoming familiar with the common patterns of serious illness we are better prepared to make intelligent decisions about continuing treatment for ourselves and our loved ones — or calling it quits.

Universal processes

The author discusses the most common causes of death — heart attack, old age, Alzheimer's, violence, AIDS and cancer — and with unrelenting honesty and unsettling detail, describes precisely what happens to the shocked or disintegrating body. He chooses these six categories for discussion because they "have characteristics that are representative of certain universal processes that we all experience as we are dying."

Where suicide among the elderly is concerned, he is sure that a large number kill themselves because they suffer from "quite remediable" depression. With proper medication and therapy most would be relieved of the cloud of despair that envelopes them.

On the other hand, he is sympathetic to the decision of an elderly Harvard physicist dying of cancer to kill himself, and concurs with the scientist's declaration, "When the ultimate end is inevitable, as it now appears to be, the individual has the right to ask his doctor to end it for him." Of course, he is well aware, of the moral and legal difficulties involved in such a decision.

The AIDS patient, he asserts, is suffering from such a baffling array of medical problems that the doctors and caretakers must be filled with a sense of "awestruck gratitude" that so much has already been accomplished. Nonetheless, a cure seems distant and no matter "the perseverance and moral strength so many patients muster in the face of lethal certainty, the pitiless process by which they die is dispiriting anew with every re-enactment."

Unrelentingly realistic

In sharp contrast to his cold, clinical accounts of the process of dying, is his description of the decline and death of the beloved grandmother with whom he shared a bedroom until he was in his late teens; as well as the story of his well-intentioned mismanagement of the care of his older brother when he was dying of cancer.

In summing up his philosophy of life and death, Nuland makes clear that the art of dying is the art of living. As a Jew he commends the traditional phrase recited at funerals, "May his or her memory serve as a blessing." It is not in the last weeks or days that we compose the message by which we will be remembered, but in all the decades that preceded them. "Those who live in dignity will die in dignity."

This book is wise and helpful — and unrelentingly realistic. It teaches that you have to learn to do everything, even to die, and it echoes the truth in the well known poem by Dylan Thomas, "We do not go gently into that good night."

Salsberg's a perfect Tevye in Fiddler on the Roof

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Gerry Salsberg makes the long journey from Anatevka to Bathurst Street a triumphal homecoming as he stars in Fiddler on the Roof which runs at Leah Posluns Theatre until May 1.

If ever a role was created for the 45-year-old Toronto actor it was the quarrelsome and lovable Tevye the dairyman and Salsberg reached deep into his acting bag to reveal hidden skills. He may not be a Caruso when it comes to hitting the high notes, but the mannerisms of the man who has long soliloquies with his creator were perfect.

Around him, a cast of 35 sing, dance and argue their way through a splendid production of a play that is timeless in its depiction of the ability of the Jewish people to deflect adversity with humor.

"I've worked with Nehemiah Persoff and Herschel Bernardi in the role of Tevye, and Gerry Salsberg is my favorite," said director Reva Stern, who produced Fiddler at Leah Posluns in 1982 with Persoff in the title role.

Leah Posluns Theatre is almost a second home to Salsberg who has trod the boards there eight other times. But this time it was truly his night and he reveled in the role. "Friends who saw me in the shower at the Y ridiculed the idea that I would play Tevye," he said after the opening show. "They said I was too thin. What a compliment!"

On stage, as he pulls his wagon because his horse has a sore left leg, Salsberg actually looks portly without any padding, because his shirt and trousers billow out. He is, indeed, the perplexed father of five unmarried daughters who wonders why he can't be a rich man with a seat by the eastern wall in the synagogue.

Stern has scaled down the current Fiddler from its 1982 version, not in numbers of dancers and villagers, but to fit it more to the Chagall painting type of setting that she feels the original Sholom Aleichem stories had in mind. The sets by Samantha Burson do this admirably.

"I wanted more movement, a kind of leprechaun atmosphere, and an avoidance of too much sentimentality," Stern said.

This approach of toning down builds up the central character of Tevye, but it has its deficits too. For instance, Miriam Newhouse plays the matchmaker Yente without that broad, florid edge that endears the character to generations of theatregoers. Jack Duffy, in the role of the rabbi, minces rather than swaggers, giving the impression that he is doing a minimalist version of the role.

Gerry Salsberg as Tevye in Fiddler on the Roof.

The boorish Lazar Wolf, the butcher, played by Allan Price, is not nearly as odious and repugnant as an old bridegroom for Tzeitel as he could be.

On the other hand, as Tevye would say, Alon Nashman, as Motel the tailor, though still acting in a restrained manner, rises above the crowd to give the role solid credibility, his sallow complexion and fragile build adding to his appeal as a diffident suitor. He is one of the play's real surprises.

As Golde, Tevye's wife, Deedee Langford clears the decks for Salsberg to be the star, the only quibble being that she hardly looks older than her older daughters. When Hodel complains that Yente's proposed suitor is bald, Golde says, "If you want hair, marry a monkey."

James Vezina as the leering innkeeper Mordcha adds a nice note of malice and Raquel Duffy contributes a fine voice and shining countenance as Hodel who marries the revolutionary student Perchik from Kiev played with suitable conviction by Steven Gallagher. "The Bible says you must never trust an employer," Perchik tells Hodel.

Fiddler is sure to attract full houses in these days when Jews are reminded day by day of their history. And it deserves them.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

"Harpo Marx, having played a mute in all his films, was probably the most articulate of all the Marx brothers," declares Barbara McGurn as we sit in the Oak Room of New York's famed Algonquin Hotel, awaiting the entrance of cabaret performer K.T. Sullivan.

The next moment McGurn, who is equal parts literary scholar and hotel publicist, launches into an anecdote about the young Tallulah Bankhead, whose family put her up at the Algonquin and asked its manager, Frank Case, to watch over her. "Frank Case said, 'I can either run a hotel or keep an eye on Tallulah — not both.' "

About Dorothy Parker, who lived at the hotel in the 1920s and was part of its legendary Round Table, the well-read McGurn waxes almost poetic. "My feeling is that Parker and [Robert] Benchley were really of their time. Her poetry was wonderful. I think she's a cult figure among women. Adolescent girls feel about Parker and her poetry the way adolescent boys feel about Catcher In The Rye."

Though her conversation roves to Franklin P. Adams, Noel Coward, William Faulkner, Edna Ferber, F. Scott Fitzgerald, George S. Kaufman, Sinclair Lewis, Harold Ross, Robert Sherwood, Gertrude Stein, Alexander Woollcott and other writers associated with the hotel and its famed literary circle, McGurn keeps returning to the subject of Dorothy Parker, like a hummingbird intoxicated by the bittersweet nectar of Parker's ironic and sometimes caustic wit.

Brevity, according to this witty epigrammatic writer, "is the soul of lingerie." Understanding, said she, consists of "mutual praise and pity." And Love? "Quicksilver in the hand/ Leave the fingers open and it stays in the palm; clutch it and it darts away." Regarding the sexes, she perceived that "Woman wants monogamy; man delights in novelty/ Love is woman's moon and sun; man has other forms of fun/ Woman lives but in her lord; count to ten and man is bored." And it was Parker who made the oft-quoted if somewhat myopic observation: "Men seldom make passes/ At girls who wear glasses."

Daughter of a Jewish father, Dorothy Rothschild Parker (1893-1967) is especially topical right now, says McGurn, because this is the centenary year of her birth and because director Robert Altman is currently producing a cinematic biography of her for release later this year.

British intrigued by Round Table

"As you get older you understand what she was talking about — love, the ruefulness of it all... You see how insightful her poetry was, how she understood about life as a woman. However, I don't think she was a feminist."

The British are especially intrigued by the Round Table, says McGurn, possibly because of parallels to British literary circles like Bloomsbury or the Mermaid Tavern of Elizabethan times. "In Shakespeare's day, I don't think there were any women at the Mermaid Tavern, unless they were wenches. The Mermaid was certainly a collection of wits but on a cruder level, I'm sure. They weren't quite so genteel as at the Algonquin." Edna Ferber once wrote of the Round Table: "Their standards were high, their vocabulary fluent, fresh, astringent and very, very tough. Theirs was a tonic influence, one on the other, and all on the world of American letters. The people they could not and would not stand were the bores, hypocrites, sentimentalists and the socially pretentious. They were ruthless toward charlatans, toward the pompous and the mentally and artistically dishonest. Casual, incisive, they had a terrible integrity about their work and a boundless ambition." This year marks the 75th anniversary of the Round Table, and McGurn says she is "agitating" for two historical plaques, one outside the hotel and another in the Rose Room where a multitude of famous Round Table ripostes first resounded. "We're a cultural landmark as well as an architectural landmark," she says. "The Plaza and the Waldorf Astoria are also architectural landmarks, and while I don't want to disparage either of those establishments, neither would call itself a cultural landmark."

According to Literary New York: A History And Guide by Susan Edmiston and Linda D. Cirino (McGraw Hill, 1976; reprinted 1991), "There is a myth that anything written at the Algonquin must be a success. Perhaps in hope, if not belief, many writers — including Tennessee Williams, John Updike, Bruce Catton, Peter De Vries, Gore Vidal, Graham Greene, Gunter Grass, Art Buchwald, Thornton Wilder and John Osborne — still stay at the hotel."

Although the Rose Room has been lovingly restored, McGurn readily admits that its historic centrepiece has not survived. "We literally lost the Round Table. Don't forget, this was a functioning hotel. It wasn't somebody's home. If you have a table and the legs go, you replace it. Had we known, we would have had it repaired."

Small and cosy, and elegantly decorated in the Edwardian fashion, the Algonquin Hotel is located at 59 W. 44th St. in Manhattan, telephone, (212) 840-6800. Rates for its 165 rooms and suites begin at about $195 (US).

Trek to Venezuela is not for the timid

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

I was intrigued by the adventure promised in Explore Worldwide's literate catalogue.

It seemed ideal for my needs, holding out the promise of a physically invigorating vacation, with hearty campfire meals, in a sufficiently exotic locale at a reasonable price.

I settled for Explore's three-week holiday in Venezuela, The Lost World, an expedition by four-wheel-drive Landcruiser, plane, canoe and foot through virgin rainforests and up a mythic table mountain.

Since Explore Worldwide is a British company, I was not surprised that all but three of the 14 participants were Brits. Apart from myself, there was a Canadian from British Columbia and an Irish woman from Belfast. We ranged in age from 23 to 69, largely single, middle-class men and women.

Colin was a TV editor; Elaine, a nurse; Anita, a student nurse; Steve, a warehouse clerk; Myles, a mineral planner; Andrew, an economist; Anne-Marie, an employment counsellor; Naomi, an artist; Jess, an art dealer; Mark, an English teacher; Lara, a student; Derek, a retired businessman; and Sue, his wife, a former teacher and secretary.

The group was led by Michael Westphal, a German national married to a Venezuelan, and Anthony Rivas Merrill, a Canadian resident of Caracas. The cook-cum-funnyman was Tony, a portly fellow who amused everyone.

After a debriefing, the tour got under way with a flight from Caracas to Ciudad Bolivar, a charming colonial city on the Orinoco River. From there, we were flown by chartered aircraft to Kamarata, a dusty Indian village on the edge of the jungle.

The trip to Kamarata was via Angel Falls, the world's highest waterfall. We flew over dessicated plains, unbroken jungle, snaking rivers and cloud-shrouded mountains sprouting a profusion of miniature waterfalls. From the window of the Antonov, Angel Falls, disappointingly, was an unimpressive trickle. During the rainy reason, however, it is a raging torrent worthy of its name.

The following day, we were driven to Kavak, an Indian village of conical thatched huts within walking distance of a thundering waterfall which empties into a cool, secluded pool in the pristine rainforest. What a sight! What an experience!.

The five-day idyll down the Akanan and Carrao, with their occasional rapids and whirlpools, was supremely relaxing. We saw flights of butterflies, turtles dozing on logs, one Anaconda snake and periodic Indian outposts. And, of course, there was always time for swimming.

We attempted to reach the base of Angel Falls via the Churun, a tributary of the Carrao. But we failed, the water level being too low.

The canoe trip ended in the indolent resort of Canaima, which is accessible only by boat or plane. On the last leg to Canaima, we donned life jackets for the whitewater rapids descent.

With its lagoon, multiple waterfalls, palm trees and sandy beach, Canaima enabled us to gather our strength for the challenge of Roraima.

Nearly 3,000 metres in elevation, Roraima rises from the lush forest floor of the Guyana Shield. Steeped in Indian lore, and mythologized by novelist Arthur Conan Doyle, Roraima is a behemoth.

From the Indian village of Peraitepui, we set off for Roraima, striding across the shadeless savannah, traversing knee-high grass and gingerly negotiating streams and boulder-strewn rivers.

We slept in the open, under majestic skies sprinkled with stars.

On the third day of the trek, beneath the sheer rock face of Roraima, we began the hike to the summit. The ascent, which was moderate to strenuous, took us through a lovely rainforest pitted with boulders.

The top of Roraima resembled a desert but was really an immense bog, framed by eerie black rock formations and craggy canyons, a prehistoric landscape of bleak beauty often obscured by chilly fog.

We spent the night in the "hotel," a rock overhang, and the following day, we observed the flora — the tiny orchids, the wispy lichen, the carnivorous plants, the twisted trees.

We also rock-climbed, and some of us planted ourselves on the edge of the precipice with a breathtaking view of the undulating countryside.

The hardiest made a demanding full-day hike to the Triple Frontier, where the borders of Venezuela, Brazil and Guyana converge. The rest were content to walk to Roraima's crystal pools and bathe in its bracing waters.

Our last, lazy hours in Venezuela unfolded on an isolated tropical beach in Tacarigua La Laguna, a three- hour drive from Caracas.

Tending to blisters, insect bites and aching calves and knees, we unanimously agreed that this had been a great, perhaps once-in-a-lifetime, summer camp-like holiday, brimming with camaraderie and, naturally, adventure.

Wilderness retreat beckons

By MARC HUBER
Special to the CJN

HALIBURTON, Ont. — I recently returned to the Domain of Killien for the first time in a decade.

Nestling the border of Algonquin Park in Haliburton, Ont., the Domain is a magnificent place to reinvigorate.

My most striking memories of the resort were its meals. They continue to be one of the most memorable parts of a visit.

Guests at the 28-room inn can stay inside the main lodge, or in eight private wooden cottages. The wood cottages have a new pine trim, and there are plans to add decks. Their simple exterior belies the gracious warmth inside. Franklin fireplaces and a full bin of wood are in each cottage, along with first-class amenities. Rooms in the main lodge are also splendidly furnished and boast whirlpool tubs.

You feel you have the entire 5,000-acre retreat to yourself. Guests have full run of a wildlife preserve and hiking trails lead to four private lakes stocked with brook trout, small- and large-mouth bass and rainbow trout.

A one-hour walk to Delphis Lake from the estate's stone gate, rewards hikers with a solo rowboat ride, private fly fishing or a picnic in an isolated wilderness cabin. The inn's mountain bikes are another way to travel. And when it snows, the grounds double as cross-country ski trails. Beaver, deer, raccoons, foxes and an abundance of birds roam the estate.

Rowboats, canoes and a CL-16 sailboat are for use on Drag Lake. There are two tennis courts, and golf or downhill skiing can be arranged at nearby resorts. In winter, guests can rent snowshoes, or use the inn's lighted skating rink. Hockey sticks are available.

The Domain is open year round, and weekends are often highlighted by special gourmet or ecological themes. Prices range from $112 to $168 per person plus taxes and 15 per cent gratuities, including the use of facilities and two meals. There is an additional charge to sail the CL-16. Cross-country skis and fly-fishing rods can be rented.

For reservations, call (705) 457-1100. Parents with children under 6 should make babysitting arrangements in advance with the Domain. No pets. A 2½-hour drive north of Toronto. P.O. Box 810, Haliburton, Ont. K0M 1S0.

The Final Frontier

Plus-Size Styles

The Spring/Summer '94 season has arrived and The Answer Salon has a fabulous collection of designer fashions.

The Answer Salon caters to women in the size 14-24 range, who are looking for casual, career, or evening wear. The salon offers a wide variety of looks. There is something for every taste and every budget.

In business since 1986, The Answer knows its customer. They focus on satisfying her fashion needs with personalized service, including alterations, for the "perfect fit."

This season, the look is quite simple, which is very flattering for all figure types. The color palettes range from earth tones to navys and blacks, which are accented by reds, yellows, and greens.

Classic suits are being shown with both long and short jackets, depending on the customer's proportions and the look she wants to achieve.

Weekend wear styles are more fluid. Long vests and shirts accompany palazzo pants and flowing skirts. This season designers are showing styles that convey the look of casual comfort and elegance. Many natural fibres are being used.

The Answer offers a wide range of clothing from various designers such as, Givenchy en Plus, Della Spiga, Jones New York, Tru Blouse, Northern Isles, Leon Levin, Jacques Vert, Jeremy D. Cocoon, I B Diffusion, Nipon, Pendelton, and other leading designers.

Matana Judaica expands

Within four short years of opening MATANA Judaica, owners Naomi Raanani and Riva Green have seen their business expand to the point where they have moved from their original location to spacious new facilities in the Toys R Us plaza at Steeles and Hilda.

As implied by the store's name, Matana emphasizes their wide selection of giftware including seder plates, mezuzot, kiddush cups and menorahs. Many artist pieces are represented in ceramic, glass and ketubot (marriage contracts). Bar/bat mitzvah and bridal registration is available.

A wide variety of books, both religious and secular, for children as well as grown-ups are available. These include fiction and non-fiction, books for bar/bat mitzvah presents, reference and coffeetable books.

Toys, games, cassettes and CDs for adults and children from around the world are on display. Holidays are a special time with expanded displays including Etrogim and decorations for Sukkot, costumes for Purim and flags for Yom Ha'atzmaut.

In the community Matana is represented at book fairs within the Jewish day schools. Naomi and Riva focus on the customer service side of their business and strive to make Matana a friendly place to visit.

Business Briefs

Optimistic Economic Growth

TEL AVIV — Economic growth will be close to 5 to 6 per cent per annum over the next three years, predicts Amiram Sivan, chairman of Bank Hapoalim's board of management.

Sivan said his optimistic growth forecast is dependent on government policy.

At a Tel Aviv press conference, he said a change in the government's export policy or any other factor will influence the growth rate.

"There is an ongoing dispute on whether the growth rate will be 3 - 4 per cent or 5 to 6 per cent, I think growth will be closer to the higher figure," said Sivan.

"The year 1994 will be characterized by a higher growth rate than in 1993. In 1994, various sectors, including the construction sector will grow at a faster rate than in 1993," he said.

"I think the arguments are very theoretical. We see the data for the first three months of the year, and we are a bank that can judge these sectors better than any other institution."

Tafnukim Plans Factory

ISRAEL — Tafnukim, Amir Paper Products - Disposable Diapers plans to establish an adult diapers manufacturing facility at an investment of $4 million.

The project is in the framework of a long-term cooperation agreement with the US-based Confab, a major sanitary products manufacturer.

Tafnukim and Confab will set up a factory based on U.S. know-how and both companies' research and development efforts. In addition, Tafnukim will distribute Confab's products on the local market under the Surety label.

Lead Underwriters For FEPZ

ISRAEL — American businessmen behind the establishment of the Free Export Processing Zone (FEPZ) announced that Merrill Lynch will join Salomon Brothers as lead underwriters for the development of the zone.

Salomon Brothers agreed to underwrite the effort about a month ago, said David Yerushalmi, chairman of the Israel Export Development Co.

Yerushalmi added that Merrill Lynch waited to join to see how the legislation establishing the FEPZ was faring. Final FEPZ legislation is expected to be approved at the end of the month.

Yerushalmi said something is being worked out on the issue of foreign financial services that will be included in the final FEPZ legislation.

Yerushalmi has contended that foreign financial services are essential to the FEPZ's operations, while the Bank of Israel has opposed them for fear they may undermine its control of banking activities.

Yerushalmi said that "we've turned the corner", and the final bill will include foreign financial services language to the liking of all parties, including the Bank of Israel.

The following business briefs were supplied by Israel's Economic Mission in Toronto (416) 961-1242.

Unemployment Rate Breaks

ISRAEL — Israel's unemployment statistics have cracked the 10 per cent barrier.

After sticking stubbornly above 10 per cent for the first three quarters of last year, the unemployment rate dropped to nine per cent for the final quarter of 1993. It had been as high as 11 per cent the year before.

What's behind the country's better job prospects? Gross National Product growth is a significant factor, as is last year's partial closure of the territories, which forced employers to hire Israelis rather than Palestinians.

The bad news is an immigration decline. With fewer olim, there were fewer men and women looking for work.

Prescription for Success

UNITED STATES — Based on last year's profit results, the economic diagnosis for Teva Pharmaceutical Industries is not just healthy — it's robust.

Teva reported an 81 per cent profit increase over 1992, based largely on the activities of Lemmon, its American subsidiary. Lemmon is heavily involved in generic drugs.

Teva's worldwide sales totaled $502 million last year, with only about 20 per cent coming from Israel.

The company, which trades in New York on NASDAQ, has been pumping millions into research and plant improvements to increase its production capacity.

Fast Food Fights

ISRAEL — Israel is quickly becoming a hamburger heaven.

In May, Burger King will be opening five kosher outlets in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Raanana, Netanya and Kiryat Bialik in the Haifa region.

However, Burger King, which is franchised to Rikmor, an Israeli company, could find the quickly expanding fast food market tough to penetrate. McDonald's just opened its own restaurant. Then there's McDavid, Wimpy's and Pizza Hut to worry about.

Burger King is banking on a seemingly unlimited Israeli fascination with a quick fix for hungry stomachs.

Rikmor will be investing more than $1.65 million in its five Burger King branches.

Preparing for Pilgrims

ISRAEL — Israel's Ministry of Tourism is setting up a special Christian pilgrimage department.

Israel believes the Pope's visit in May will lead the way for the country's largest ever ingathering of pilgrims.

Israeli tourist offices around the world have been aggressively marketing the Holy Land as a prime pilgrimage destination for some time.

It is, in fact, possible for tourists in Israel to trace, step by step, the origins of Christianity.

Speedier Privatization for El Al

TEL AVIV — El Al's flight into private hands will be a quicker one than first anticipated.

The government is selling over half of El Al's shares on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange in two stages.

Funds raised will be used for aircraft and equipment upgrading.

Technically, El Al is still in receivership, but the airline showed a healthy profit last year.

TIPS FROM PROS

By LEON BOOKMAN

TORONTO — You will not get very far in your chosen career if you do not have some basic knowledge about how to deal with and motivate people.

Here are some suggestions for improving your capacity to motivate people. Each one should and can be integrated into your daily behavior. These are not one-shot cure-alls, but taken as a whole, they add up to effective motivation.

Never belittle people. No person likes thinking others regard him or her as stupid. Reprimand an employee using any other term — lax, lazy, indifferent, sloppy — but call them stupid and you will destroy their initiative.

Never criticize a employee in front of others. Everyone knows this is a cardinal sin, but few managers practice it. The temptation is there. When you have to criticize someone make sure no one is around to hear you. Take the person aside, say what you have to say in a polite, firm manner, making sure the employee understands what you are criticizing him or her for.

No one wants to work without an objective. When individuals know they are being evaluated according to a single, fair standard, they have a target to shoot for. They can modify their performance accordingly and try to meet that standard. If your standards are unfair or erratic, employees will try to beat the game.

Be aware of you own biases and prejudices towards people. All of us have biases and prejudices; no one is completely devoid of them. The question is, are you aware of them? Do you allow them to interfere with your evaluation of a person's performance?

Give praise when praise is due. Praise, when deserved, is one of the best motivators. It is especially helpful when you praise someone where they have tried and have done a good job, particularly a difficult job handled well. Avoid praising every little thing your employees do for it will quickly lose meaning.

Keep your employees informed. You don't have to tell every company secret, of course, but it is an evidence of regard to inform employees of matters in which they have a direct interest. It's another way of showing your concern.

Motivation destroyed by doubt

Motivate by example. I have never seen a successful motivator who was not himself or herself highly motivated. You motivate by example. Employees like to feel they are living up to an image of their boss, particularly when the boss is devoted to the job of making the company successful.

Show concern. You must be sufficiently attuned to the fact that each one of your employees is concerned about their own future and their own self. You must make them feel you too are concerned about them personally and their families. Go out of your way to help. This means more than merely doing favors for your people. Frequently it might mean criticizing the person you care about and want to help.

Be willing to learn from others. When an employee comes to you with an idea or suggesion, give them an honest audience. Listen to what they have to say. By listening you will motivate them into thinking for themselves and you may learn a thing or two yourself, which when applied for practical purposes will further motivate the individual.

Demonstrate confidence. If you have any doubt about your department, your staff, your projects, your company, review them alone and in private. Exhibiting doubt completely destroys motivation. If you, the leader, is afraid, what is left to inspire followers?

Delegate. Delegate to those competent around you as much of your work load as possible. Let them revel in their own success.

Finally — you can buy a person's time, you can buy their physical presence at a given place, you can buy a measured number of skilled muscular motions, but you cannot buy enthusiasm, loyalty or the devotion of minds and souls. You have to earn these things. Being an effective motivator will help immeasurably.

Keeping a step ahead in today's job market

By STEPHANIE CHAPMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — While many economists contend that the recession is over, long lines at unemployment offices around the country seem to dispute this belief.

The few available positions that are advertised swamp potential employers with thousands of resumes. The fax runs continuously and the phone never stops ringing. Once the application deadline has passed, the initial screening process begins. How do you make your resume stand out among the masses?

Finding a job is hard, sophisticated work and no one knows this better than Sandy Wise of Sandy Wise Consulting. She is a human resource and career consultant in Toronto, who has plenty of advice for the frustrated unemployed.

When applying for a position, Wise says most people submit a two-page summary that categorizes their skills and highlights certain qualifications. Real work experience is also included. This is called the functional resume format.

"Let's take a look at those functional skills [and broaden them]. You have to be able to show an employer how you work," Wise says, adding that virtually all skills can be transferred out of the work environment or into it.

In essence, the resume should present your personality and values about work, as well as describing what you like to do, she says. It should also look and sound like you. For example, while a policy writer wouldn't jazz up his application, a computer expert may take the opportunity to show off some of his creative skills. Do not use resume jargon; employers don't trust it, Wise says.

With the emphasis that is placed on the resume and cover letter, it was surprising to learn that many don't land a job through such means. Networking, an almost irritating buzzword of the '90s, in conjunction with the resume, is the key.

Wise says that she spends an entire session with clients teaching them the finer points of networking. This process involves obtaining personal feedback from at least three honest friends and tapping industry experts for information about the sector. However, if a meeting was arranged specifically to gather information, Wise warns against asking for a job at the same time.

Interview techniques and communication skills is another session given before Wise helps set a personal job search plan for her clients. This final step provides potential career options, information research, industry sectors to pursue and the enhancement of personal support networks.

As the eyes and ears of the job industry, Wise says that employers today are just as stressed as the employees. "No one feels safe," Wise says, citing taxes and government legislation as two reasons.

Sandy Wise

Employers are not only working harder themselves, they are also demanding more time and effort from their employees. In order to gain some security, Wise says, many are turning the age-old idea of cottage industries into reality. For example, a salesperson may try the mail order business on the side.

"The nine to five job ideal is gone. To feel confident, people have to learn not to limit themselves. They must broaden their skills and training," Wise says.

The small business sector may soon be the salvation of the economy. Wise stresses that such enterprises will do much to provide jobs and training in the future.

Wise's assessment of the economy is not a positive one and she says unemployment will continue. "There may be new opportunities in the construction sector but manufacturing will never be back to where it was. Cutbacks in the health industry will continue right across the country, as this is the only place to squeeze because of cutbacks to grants.

"More people will lose their jobs — not as many as now — and the unemployment will shift to different sectors," she says, citing growth in areas such as technology, diagnostic procedures in the health industries and the service sector.

Wise has over 20 years experience in career planning, training and development and employment equity community development. Her academic training in adult education and counselling is combined with a strong foundation of knowledge and experience in all work-related issues for individuals, groups and organizations.

Her clients include organizations in the public and private sector, providing consultation to all levels of staff and managers. Her seminars and workshops encompass a variety of subjects from equity issues to public advocacy workshops to stress management. The next of Wise's workshops, which run once a month, will begin by the end of April.

The Coaching Clinic breaks old habits to form new ones

By LORI DENNIS
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In our never-ending quest for self-improvement, we look to experts for advice. The kind of advice that comes fast and furious these days in the form of self-help books, audio and video-tapes, motivational seminars, and training courses.

Recently, a company with a fresh approach has appeared on the Toronto scene. It's called The Coaching Clinic and it's modelled on a format that purports to provide training advantages not found anywhere else.

Whether you want to learn how to market yourself more professionally, build better relationships, parent more effectively or deal with stress more intelligently, The Coaching Clinic offers new strategies and practical ways to be a better person in 10 months.

But why do North Americans need constant support and training?

"The answer," says founder Jerome Shore, "is simple. We now need to become much more self-reliant in order to succeed in the workplace. There are so many more of us on our own without the support systems that we once relied on."

Jerome Shore

Shore left advertising to start The Coaching Clinic. Participants meet in small groups for three-hour workshops once a month. He says the workshops offer six important advantages over other types of training: "it's time effective, it's cumulative, it's cost-effective, it's highly focused, it's practical and down-to-earth, and it's supportive."

Shore himself leads a clinic, Marketing Your Professional Service. Students have 10 monthly half-day sessions in which they learn to break old habits and form new ones.

Aside from acquiring useful information and expert advice, these groups all involve a special kind of bonding. "In Gloria Steinem's The Revolution From Within, she talks about how society used to have a natural affinity to forming groups. There were quilting bees for women. And men hung around in barbershops.

"Today, we tend to be much more isolated. By coming into contact with others who share the same challenges and similar goals, we develop a support system and have the opportunity to hear ideas from other people — elements that are crucial to achieving success," says Shore.

PRESIDENTIAL AID

The Young Forum — established six months ago to encourage the development of Israeli business people — at one of their most important meetings to date. The group met with Israel's State President Ezer Weizman. The average age of the group's members is 27 although some are as young as 20. A spokesman for the organization said that with a meeting with the president under their belt, each member will have a head start over the competition when it comes to networking. This photo shows Weizman with a delegation from the group at his residence in Jerusalem. Weizman urged members to return in a year's time to deliver a progress report of their activities.

TORONTO — The old adage "everybody loves a bargain" has never been truer than during the recession. Bargain hunting has turned into a serious hobby for many and a means of survival for some.

Wendy and Stuart Teperman, owners of Contents Connection understand this bargain mentality very well — their 5-year-old business just keeps growing as the population's disposable income continues to diminish and bankruptcies rise in number.

What began as a natural extension to Stuart's role in his family demolition business and Wendy's real estate career has ultimately turned into a two-tiered business venture which includes on-site estate and content sales, as well as a 3,000 square foot showroom filled with resale furniture, gift items and accessories.

"Five years ago, we both decided that we wanted to do something different," explains Wendy. "Stuart was in a business that was connected with the liquidation of businesses, and I was dealing with people who were downsizing from homes to condos. In both cases, our customers needed help in selling their furniture and accessories. We had just the right experience and contacts to make it work."

The Tepermans point out that while many resale or second-hand shops have opened for business in the past several years, Contents Connection has kept its competitive edge by offering services at many levels. Their relationship with customers begins by providing a fair market appraisal of the customer's goods. The company will then conduct the sale, sell the more valuable leftover pieces in their showroom and organize a charity to pick up those pieces that aren't saleable. They'll also arrange to have the home cleaned after the sale and will take care of the sale of the property. Other services include offering customers decorating ideas and furnishing homes for corporate executives.

"We try to be sensitive to our customers and to help them throughout the entire process because in many cases we're dealing with the belongings of a family member who has passed away or with a customer who has gone bankrupt and is being forced to sell everything. But many of our customers are simply downsizing because the kids have left home and they have an excess of furniture," says Wendy.

"For the consumer market, buying resale items has not only become important for those whose budgets are tight. It's actually become a chic way to shop," says Wendy. "People have become more knowledgeable about furniture and know quality when they see it outside a fancy furniture shop. We also provide an opportunity for customers to furnish their homes in older styles such as a '50's decor — styles that can't be found elsewhere."

Entrepreneur's achievements exceed his expectations

TORONTO — Until Lawrence Bloomberg co-founded First Marathon Inc., he said there were no Jewish owners of Canadian brokerage firms that sold stocks and bonds to banks, trust companies and insurance companies.

Started in 1979 by Bloomberg and three of his colleagues from a Toronto brokerage with under a million shares, First Marathon had revenues of $180 million last year. The company, with 350 employees worldwide, currently trades more blocks of Canadian securities than any other company in the world.

Bloomberg told members of the Young Business Network of the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) gathered at the Toronto Stock Exchange recently that he became an entrepreneur because he realized he would never get rich working for someone else.

The first year the foursome planned to make $1.5 million in revenue, a realistic goal according to Bloomberg, since each of them had made at least $300,000 to $400,000 yearly at their jobs. Business turned out to be much better than expected.

"In the first year instead of making $1.5 million revenue we made $1.5 million profit and we never looked back," he said.

Bloomberg, president, CEO and director of First Marathon, attributes the company's success to the superior service it offers, including product research he says is better than other institutional firms, a hiring policy that brings in only the best people and low overhead.

Keeping the company lean means there are no base salaries for production staff, among them investment bankers, traders and analysts. "It intimidates some and causes some not to want to join the company," said Bloomberg. "In fact, everyone that has joined us has done so much better than they've done anyplace else."

First Marathon went public in 1984 at a time when the securities industry looked like it would become more capital intensive, and "if you didn't have capital you weren't going to be able to play."

Manufacturing opportunities

First Marathon played with a variety of ventures, including a discount brokerage sold last year to the Toronto-Dominion Bank. The company is developing its investment banking, and wants to expand its trading network of independent U.S. brokerage.

International markets are the key to success for both private and public companies today, said Bloomberg. "You've got to go outside this market, because this market is too small."

He noted there are great opportunities in Canadian manufacturing for those with an eye on international markets, adding that raising capital in Canada is easy. If you are smart, he said, you should be able to build a profitable business.

As the co-chair of this year's UJA Operation Exodus campaign, Bloomberg spoke of the importance of community work and the need for Jewish leadership.

Bloomberg promoted the tangible benefits of community work for business people, including the opportunity to establish a network of contacts. "I think for those who get involved in community work you're viewed a little differently, not just as a businessman-warrior, but as having a softer side, and in the long run that helps you tremendously in your business," he said.

EL AL

THE AIRLINE OF ISRAEL

Israel, the Promised Land of the Bible, is today a modern, thriving, bustling and vibrant country. For centuries, the sites of many of the most stirring events in the history of mankind lay dormant beneath shifting sands and crumbling terraces, until the land was reclaimed and revitalized by the People of Israel, returning from exile. In today's Israel, cities, towns and villages, fertile farms and green forests, sophisticated industries and well-developed commercial enterprises have replaced barren hillsides, swamps and desert wilderness. But the echoes of the past still reverberate amid this dynamic rebirth.
Jerusalem, the Holy City and eternal Capital of Israel, retains its aura of sanctity and welcomes a constant stream of pilgrims of all faiths. The contemporary city of Be'er Sheva (Beersheba) stands at the threshold of the Negev Desert, as it did in the days of the Patriarch Abraham. Eilat, Israel's outlet to the Red Sea, is again a busy seaport, as it was during the reign of King Solomon. Besides its religious and historical sites, Israel has much to offer the tourist - vast stretches of clean, sunny beaches, modern cities and hotels, kibbutzim (collective villages), theatres and nightclubs, health resorts and colourful markets - all within a compact geographic microcosm: only a few hours travelling time separates the sun-warmed seashores and the snow-capped mountains, the lush forests and the scenic desert scape. Israel is indeed a rich and varied bouquet of attractions.

The State of Israel

The independent State of Israel was proclaimed on May 14, 1948. Israel is a parliamentary democracy. Its 120-member unicameral legislature, the Knesset, is elected by universal suffrage according to the proportional representation system. The government is administered by the Cabinet, headed by the Prime Minister. The official Head of State is the President, elected by the Knesset for a five-year term.

Geography

Israel is a Middle Eastern continental crossroads, bounded by the Mediterranean Sea to the west, the Great Syrian-African Rift to the east and the Red Sea to the south, sharing its borders with Lebanon, Syria, Jordan and Egypt. The northern and central part of Israel, where most of the population is concentrated, is divided into three distinct longitudinal sectors: The Coastal Plain, to the west, including the major urban centres of Tel Aviv and Haifa; The Valley Region, to the east, with the Jordan River linking the two inland seas (the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea). The mountain range in Central Israel, incorporating the Hills of Galilee, Samaria and Judea, including the capital, Jerusalem. In the northeast rise of Golan Heights and snow-capped Mt. Hermon, while the Southern Region comprises the Negev and Arava Deserts, which constitute much of the country's land area, including Be'er Sheva, capital of the Negev, and Eilat on the Red Sea.
Altitudes vary from 2,224 m. (7,296 ft.) at Mt. Hermon to -392 m. (-1,286 ft.) at the Dead Sea, the lowest spot on earth.

Climate

Israel enjoys long, warm, dry summers (April-October) and generally mild winters (November-March), with somewhat drier, cooler weather in hilly regions, such as Jerusalem and Safed. Even in winter, spells of rain are interspersed with brilliant sunshine.

Population

As of 1993, Israel had a population of nearly five million persons, comprising a Jewish majority and sizable communities of Moslems, Christians, Druze and other minorities.

Languages

Hebrew, the revitalized language of the Bible, is the official language of Israel, along with Arabic. English, the most common second language, is a mandatory subject at school. French, Spanish, German, Yiddish, Russian, Polish and Hungarian are also widely spoken, and local and international newspapers and periodicals in a variety of languages are readily available. All street and road signs and most commercial signs are in Hebrew, Arabic and English.

Health Regulations

There are no vaccination requirements for visitors entering Israel.

Pets: Dogs or cats accompanying visitors must be over four months old, inoculated against rabies and bear a valid official veterinary health certificate from the country of origin.

What to Pack

Summer(April-October): Lightweight suit, slacks, shorts and open-neck shirts for men, several light cotton daytime dresses and a more formal afternoon dress for women, light shoes, sandals and walking shoes; sunglasses and hat (essential); swimsuit and beachwear; a light coat, jacket or sweater for cool evenings in the hills.
Winter (November-March): Warm coat, sweaters, raincoat and hat, walking shoes, overshoes, shirts, slacks, sports jacket and suit for men, warm suit, blouses, skirts and slacks, long dress or evening skirt for women; lighter clothing and swimsuit for Eilat, the Dead Sea region and the Red Sea coast; umbrella. Between Seasons: Suits, light coats, sweaters and light blouses or shirts.

Electrical Appliances

The electric current in Israel is 220 Volts AC, single phase, 50 Hertz. Most Israeli sockets are of the three-pronged plugs as well. Electric shavers, travelling irons and other small appliances may be require adapters and/or transformers, which can be purchased in Israel.

Shopping

Several hundred shops through out the country have been recommended by the Ministry of Tourism for their high-quality merchandise and superior service.

Currency and Bank Information

The currency of Israel is the sheqel (IS), also called the new sheqel(NIS) (plural - sheqalim). Each sheqel is divided into 100 agorot (singular - agora). Bank notes circulate in denominations of IS 200, 50, 20 and 10 sheqalim and coins in denominations of 5 sheqalim, 1 sheqel and 50 and 10 agorot. One may bring a unlimited amount of local foreign currency into Israel in cash, travellers' cheques, letters of credit or State of Israel Bonds. Foreign currency may be exchanged at any bank and at many hotels.

Foreign currency.

Payment in foreign currency exempts tourists from Value Added Tax (VAT) on certain purchases and services. Major credit cards (American Express, Diners' Club, Visa and Master Card/Access/Eurocard) are widely accepted throughout Israel.

Before Departure

Confirming Reservations Scheduled air departures should be reconfirmed with the airline office at least 72 hours in advance, as reservations may be cancelled otherwise. Please indicate any special services required (dietary restrictions, etc.) on reconfirmation.

Airline Check-In

Passengers must check in at Ben-Gurion Airport at least two hours before departure time. El Al Israel Airlines offers an advance check-in service in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Haifa and Eilat, enabling passengers to check in their baggage and receive boarding passes the evening before the flight (except on Fridays, major Holidays and eve of Holidays). Baggage will be taken straight to the plane and passengers need arrive at the airport only one hour before departure-time.

ITINERARY

Sunday Day 1: Haifa
Arrival Ben Gurion Airport. Will be met upon arrival by Shalom-K Tours representative who will assist you through Customs and transfer you to Haifa for overnight.

Monday Day 2: Tiberias
Begin the tour of Haifa at the summit of Mt. Carmel for a breathtaking panoramic view of the Haifa Bay and Western Galilee. Continue to the golden-domed Bahai shrine to visit the exotic Persian gardens. Drive to Acre to visit the crypt of St. John and the underground crusader city. Proceed to Safed, the Center of Jewish mysticism; visit the ancient Synagogue and the Artists' Colony. Continue to the Golan Heights to see the former Syrian bunkers, Kuneitra and the new Israeli town of Kazrin. Arrival in Tiberias and continue to your hotel for overnight.

Tuesday Day 3: Jerusalem
Start the day with a visit to the Church of the Annunciation in Nazareth. Drive to Capernaum, the old town of Jesus, and then on to Tiberias, the lovely resort town, and the synagogue of the Hamat. Proceed, via Beit Shean, to Beit Alpha to see the remains of the mosaic floor of the ancient synagogue. Drive along the Jordan Valley rift to Jericho, the world's oldest city. See the excavations and end the day in Jerusalem for overnight.

Wednesday Day 4: Jerusalem
Today you will visit the Tomb of King David and the Room of the Last Supper on Mount Zion. Enter the walled city and walk through the newly restored Jewish quarter. Visit the Roman Cardo, the Herodian Quarter and continue to the Western Wall. Walk along the Via Dolorosa to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. Proceed to Mount Scopus and then to the Mount of Olives with its magnificent panoramic view of the Old City. Continue to Bethlehem, stopping at Rachel's Tomb. Visit the Church of the Nativity. Return to your hotel for overnight in Jerusalem.

Thursday Day 5: New City of Jerusalem
Today we tour the New City of Jerusalem. Visits will include Hadassah Medical Centre in Ein Karem to see the Chagall stained glass window. Proceed to the scale model of Jerusalem as it looked in the second temple period.

Yad Vashem (Memorial to the Holocaust), Israel Museum-Shrine of the book (the last home of the Dead Sea Scrolls), The Knesset, Israeli Parliament and Givat Ram Campus of the Hebrew University. Overnight in Jerusalem.

Friday Day 6: Qumeran, Dead Sea and Massada
Today we drive through the Judean Desert to the Dead Sea, the lowest point on earth, almost 1300 feet (400 meters) below sea level. Stop at Qumeran to visit the site where the Dead Sea Scrolls were found, and continue along the shore to Massada. Ascend by cable car and tour the ancient fortress where the Zealots made their last stand against the Romans before committing mass suicide in the year 73 C.E. Descend by cable car. Time and weather permitting, an opportunity will be provided to float on the Dead Sea. Return to Jerusalem for overnight.

Saturday Day 7: Jerusalem at leisure
Today you will enjoy a day at leisure for shopping, perhaps join an optional tour to of the Avshalom Nature Reserve to witness the magnificent stalactite caves and the bronze Scroll of Fire monument; revisit the Western Wall; or just relax and enjoy the many facilities of your hotel. Overnight in Jerusalem.

Sunday Day 8: To Tel Aviv/Departure
Your tour will end after breakfast. Transfer to Airport for your departure back home or extend your stay and transfer will be provided on a later date upon request. Shalom!

Continue to the golden-domed Bahai shrine to visit the exotic Persian gardens. Drive to Acre to visit the crypt of St. John and the underground crusader city. Proceed to Safed, the Center of Jewish mysticism; visit the ancient Synagogue and the Artists' Colony. Continue to the Golan Heights to see the former Syrian bunkers, Kuneitra and the new Israeli town of Kazrin. Arrival in Tiberias and continue to your hotel for overnight.

Tuesday Day 8: Jerusalem
Start the day with a visit to the Church of the Annunciation in Nazareth. Drive to Capernaum, the old town of Jesus, and then on to Tiberias, the lovely resort town, and the synagogue of the Hamat. Proceed, via Beit Shean, to Beit Alpha to see the remains of the mosaic floor of the ancient synagogue. Drive along the Jordan Valley rift to Jericho, the world's oldest city. See the excavations and end the day in Jerusalem for overnight.

Wednesday Day 9: Jerusalem
Today you will visit the Tomb of King David and the Room of the Last Supper on Mount Zion. Enter the walled city and walk through the newly restored Jewish quarter. Visit the Roman Cardo, the Herodian Quarter and continue to the Western Wall. Walk along the Via Dolorosa to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. Proceed to Mount Scopus and then to the Mount of Olives with its magnificent panoramic view of the Old City. Continue to Bethlehem, stopping at Rachel's Tomb. Visit the Church of the Nativity. Return to your hotel for overnight in Jerusalem.

Thursday Day 10: Jerusalem
Today we tour the New City of Jerusalem. Visits will include Hadassah Medical Centre in Ein Karem to see the Chagall stained glass window. Proceed to the scale model of Jerusalem as it looked in the second temple period. Yad Vashem (Memorial to the Holocaust), Israel Museum-Shrine of the book (the last home of the Dead Sea Scrolls), The Knesset, Israeli Parliament and Givat Ram Campus of the Hebrew University. Overnight in Jerusalem.

Friday Day 11: Jerusalem
Begin the day with a drive through the Judean Desert to the Dead Sea, the lowest point on earth, almost 1300 feet (400 meters) below sea level. Stop at Qumeran to visit the site where the Dead Sea Scrolls were found, and continue along the shore to Massada. Ascend by cable car and tour the ancient fortress where the Zealots made their last stand against the Romans before committing mass suicide in the year 73 C.E. Descend by cable car. Time and weather permitting, an opportunity will be provided to float on the Dead Sea. Return to Jerusalem for overnight.

Saturday Day 12: Jerusalem
This day is left for your enjoyment. Perhaps join an optional tour to of the Avshalom Nature Reserve to witness the magnificent stalactite caves and the bronze Scroll of Fire monument or revisit the Western Wall; or just relax and enjoy the many facilities of your hotel. Overnight in Jerusalem.

Sunday Day 13: Jerusalem
Another glorious day to enjoy as you desire!

Monday Day 14: to Tel Aviv/Departure
Your tour will end after breakfast. Transfer to Airport for your departure back home or extend your stay and transfer will be provided on a later date upon request. Shalom!

SPA HOLIDAYS - DEAD SEA

The Dead Sea area is "one of a kind", the lowest point on the face of the earth, approximately 400 meters below sea level. This unique area, in its picturesque setting of the Judean Hills to the west and the Mountains of Moab to the east, offers a natural treasure of health. The low altitude makes the pure and pollen-free air richer in oxygen and together with the dense atmosphere decreases the penetration of harmful ultraviolet rays, so that there is little danger of sunburn. The Dead Sea is laden with life-giving materials that are therapeutic for psoriasis, eczema and other skin ailments as well as muscular and articular diseases. Take time-out for relaxation, using either the special mud baths, dipping in the sea or the many other facilities available at the hotels and spa.

Above rates include the following:

- transfers from the airport to the Dead Sea and back, based on sharing transfers.
- accommodation on half board basis.

The Dead Sea is more than just another interesting sightseeing destination - it is one of the most fascinating places on earth. A place that boasts a mind-boggling combination of natural, geographical, historical and archeological phenomena that together add up to an unforgettable vacation experience. A place with year-round sunshine where you can spend endless days and weeks enjoying the delights of this unique location. And at 400 m. (1,320 ft.) below sea level, this is the lowest place on earth.

The Dead Sea region is extremely easy to get to - only an hour's drive from Jerusalem, and two hours from Ben Gurion Airport, Tel Aviv, the Sea of Galilee and Eilat.

Nature's treasure house in one of the world's largest natural health and beauty spas. A unique encounter with the elements. And a sense of history that pervades the entire area.

Even if you're blessed with the most fertile imagination, the Dead Sea will succeed in surprising you. Experience at first hand the attraction that this area has held since biblical times, immerse yourself in the primeval landscapes, and turn the lowest point on earth into the high point of your vacation.

Eilat and the Red Sea beckon with irresistible appeal. The clear blue water is enticingly warm - even in mid-winter the average daytime water temperature stays above 20 C (68 F).

There are miles of beaches to enjoy, with showers, sun beds, and other modern bathing facilities, as well as beach side promenades, parks, pubs and restaurants.

The calm surface of the sea is also ideal for fun boating activities: pedaloes, rowboats, kayaks, self-drive motor boats and "banana rides".

You can take an one-hour or a full-day cruise aboard one of the yachts of every shape and size that depart regularly from the Eilat Marina. Situated in a man-made lagoon by the North Beach hotels, the marina will eventually include over 300 modern berths.
You can even go deep sea fishing, joining with local fishermen whose catch may well end up as your evening meal. And of course, there are the gorgeous colours and shapes of the coral reefs, among the deepest and most breathtaking in the world. Few sights can compare with the coral reefs as seen from a snorkeling mask or from a glass-bottom boat.

Haifa blends together much of what is beautiful in Israel. Situated where the rocky green slopes of historic Mount Carmel meet the blue waters of a broad natural harbor, its terraced urban landscape offers a rich variety of gorgeous vistas.

Israel's third largest city, Haifa is capital of the north and home to 250,000 inhabitants, members of five different religions living in harmony. It offers biblical holy places, natural reserves with prehistoric caves, lovely cultivated gardens, the University of Haifa and Technion Israel Institute of Technology and more than a dozen museums. Cable cars link the downtown port district at the foot of the Carmel with neighborhoods on its upper slopes. This city's many promenades and scenic overlooks offer an abundance of views of Haifa's beautiful natural harbor. On a clear day, almost any day of the year, you can see clear across the sparkling waters of the bay to the medieval walled fortress city of Acre.

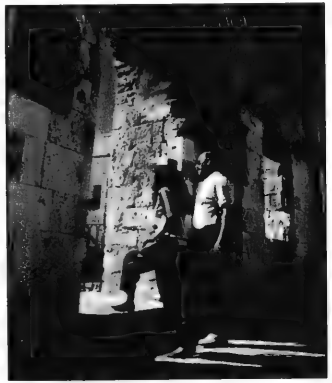
Jerusalem...is archeology and art, sacred sites and superb shopping, panoramic sun-swept promenades and moonlit concerts under the stars, classic dining and fast food restaurants, daytime walking tours and night club entertainment. And when visiting, you'll discover that Jerusalem is all this and more. For the Jerusalem of today links a historic past with a dynamic present. A vibrant cultural and cosmopolitan center, Jerusalem is a living mosaic with many faces. Hailing from over 100 countries, Israelis are a rainbow of colors, cultures, and languages. So speak right up. Israelis talk in over 70 tongues, and you're bound to hear your own while strolling through Jerusalem.

In the heart of Israel, Jerusalem is also a convenient location for visiting the entire country. Just a few hours flight from any of the European capitals, Jerusalem is less than an hour's drive from Tel Aviv, minutes from Bethlehem, and easily accessible on a day-trip basis to anywhere in Israel.

History and Archaeology

Jerusalem is the storied past. History comes alive as you trace the paths of King David, Jesus and Mohammed and discover the shrines of the world's greatest empires. You don't have to be an ardent archaeologist to be fascinated by this vanished world. A stroll around the Old City walls and informative guided walking tours take you back through time as you visit the City of David, stroll through the Cardo - a reconstruction of the city's main street thousands of years ago - tour the opulent remnants of Jerusalem's wealthy residences during the time of King Herod, and enjoy a candle-lit walk through a Fifth Century BC water tunnel - rounding out the extensive collections of Jerusalem's numerous museums.



King Solomon Hotel
Jerusalem

In a city where location is everywhere, the King Solomon Hotel places you at the center of Jerusalem...

At the crossroad of the ageless city and its modern counterpart. The King Solomon dramatic architecture reflects the city's spirit, offering gracious hospitality in the tradition of the City of Kings.

In your guest room there is individually controlled air-conditioning, colour TV and house video featuring the best in entertainment, mini fridge, 4-channel radio and direct-dial telephone service. And your unforgettable view of the City of Gold. Dine informally at the Cafe, exotically at the Cin-Lee, and in the spacious Lobby Lounge, enjoy light snacks and drinks-all Glatt Kosher.

Exploring Jerusalem is so easy from the King Solomon Hotel, and after a day of discovery, relax at the hotel's pool over looking the hills of Judea and the ever-changing desert.

Israel has over 300 hotels, offering a wide choice of accommodations to suit all tastes, purposes and budgets, ranging from small, simple facilities to five-star luxury establishments, with prices varying according to grade and season. Hotel rates are quoted in U.S. dollars and include the 15% service charge.

Kibbutz Hotels

The kibbutz (collective village) is a uniquely Israeli social experience, in which all property is collectively-owned and members receive no salaries, but are provided with housing, education for their children, medical services, and social amenities and other necessities. Most are essentially agricultural settlements, but many are shifting to a more industrially-oriented economy. There are about 250 kibbutzim throughout Israel.

Several kibbutzim, mostly in northern and central Israel, have established hotels on the premises, providing visitors with a close view of this world-renowned lifestyle. Kibbutz hotels are graded as three of four-star establishments. They offer guests the opportunity for a relaxed, informal holiday in delightful rural surroundings. Some present special evening programs about the kibbutz experience.

With six miles of wide sandy beaches, Netanya has developed as Israel's premier family resort and is actively targeting more British holiday makers.

It is 20 miles north of Tel Aviv with 2,000 rooms in around 30 hotels ranging down from the newly-refurbished Seasons and including many mid-range properties.

Other hotels catering to the British market include the Galil, new Arches, Residence, edge-of-town Blue Bay, King Solomon, Park, Goldar and Ginot Yam, many with discos and nightclubs. More hotels are planned.

In the pedestrian mall leading to the sea are restaurants, pavement cafes and two shopping centres. The resort boasts 11 cinemas.

Outdoor events include amphitheatre concerts, children's shows, folk dancing displays, open-air films, fireworks displays and disco-style dancing in the town square.

There is plenty of sports action, with sailing, windsurfing, paragliding, tennis and horse-riding; nearby Caesarea has a 18-hole golf course.

The well known Wingate Sports Institute offers indoor swimming, squash, volleyball and basketball, plus full training facilities and sports medical centre.

Migrating birds add another dimension to the resort's appeal, stopping off on their way to from sunny climes.

Like Tel Aviv, Netanya sells itself as being at the centre of the country, with Jerusalem, Haifa and the Galilee all a day trip away.

Tel Aviv and Yafo

Tel Aviv: (Founded in 1909) means Hill of Spring, but is symbolic of Ezekiel's vision. It was in Tel Aviv, that is in Babylon, when the exiled prophet saw the dry bones brought back to life by the spirit of God and returned home to the Land of Israel. Tel Aviv is also the Hebrew title of Dr. Herzl's utopian book Altneuland (Old-New-Land). The main street, Rehov Herzl, was named in memory of the founder of the Zionist movement. At the head of the street stood the stylish structure Gymnasia Herzliya. It was the first secular high school where all subjects were taught in the revived ancient language, Hebrew. Today the school has moved to more spacious grounds and the Shalom Tower and Observatory were built in its place.

Yafo: Jaffa or Joppa claims to be the oldest port city in the world. In Hebrew it means beautiful and is attributed to Japhet, son of Noah. The Greek link it with Jopa, daughter of Aeolus, ruler of the winds. Until the end of the 19th century, the entrance to its small harbor was through a gap in the surrounding reef. Poseidon, the Greek god of the seas, chained Andromeda to a rock in the reef. The young lady was to be consumed by the dragon but was saved by and married to Perseus, son of Zeus and Danea.

Excavation on the hill overlooking the port revealed that it was inhabited 4000 years ago. Yafo was allotted to the tribe of Dan, but it was a Philistine town until the reign of King David. King Solomon used Yafo and Tel Qasila on the Yarqon River to bring cedars from Lebanon to build the Temple in Jerusalem. The town is also mentioned in the biblical story of Jonah and the whale, and again as the port for timber used in building the second Temple. In the Acts of the Apostles, we are told that in Yafo Peter brought Tabitha back to life and that while he stayed in the house of Simon the Tanner, he was ordered by the Lord to bring the gospel to the gentiles. Under King Herod and the Romans, Yafo lost its supremacy to Caesarea. It regained its importance in the 8th cent. when the Moslems built their capital in nearby Ramla. In the 12th and 13th cent. Yafo was the port of the Crusader kingdom of Jerusalem. It was destroyed with all other Crusader ports by the Mamelukes and remained desolate for six hundred years.

At the beginning of the 19th cent., the Turk Aga Mahamud, known as Abu Nabut, fortified and built much of what is today's Old Jaffa. Later in the century when the western countries competed amongst themselves in building religious institutions in the Holy Land, and when Jews began returning to their homeland, Yafo prospered and grew. Its port was busy importing building materials, manufactured goods, and exporting Jaffa oranges. By the end of the 19th cent. Yafo had expanded out of its walls. Two of its new Jewish suburbs were Newe Zedek and Newe Shalom.

In 1906 bustling Jaffa celebrated the jubilee of Sultan Abdulhamid the Second, by pulling down the city's useless walls and building the city clock tower. In the same year a group of Jews left the congested town to build their homes on the northern sand dunes and called it Tel Aviv.

Israel's exciting holiday resort.
As you wind your way down the picturesque hillside, you are greeted round each bend by breathtaking panoramic vistas - a huge expanse of sky that you can almost reach up and touch, and rolling hills surrounding a sparkling crystal-blue lake. From your first glimpse of Tiberias and the Sea of Galilee you will understand why this area has been such a popular tourist destination...for over 2,000 years!
It's a fact - already in Roman times, this thriving recreation spa, built around 17 natural mineral hot springs over 600 ft. below sea level, was extending a warm welcome to tourists from every part of the ancient world. Herod Antipas, who named Tiberias in honour of the Emperor Tiberias, would approve of how the city has retained its tradition of welcoming visitors from all over the world. Modern-day Tiberias and the surrounding shores of the Sea of Galilee are an all-year-round vacation resort with something to offer absolutely every visitor. Fun. Adventure. Nightlife. Sightseeing. Hot springs. Religious shrines. Nature trails. Hills to climb. Caves to explore. Historical sites. Excavations. And a 32-mile shoreline offering every conceivable water-related activity. This is an area where some of Israel's first kibbutzim - collective farms - were established by the early pioneers at the turn of the century. The lush agricultural lands of the kibbutzim yield some of the freshest and finest produce for which Israel is so famous.

Accommodation to suit every pocket

Whether you stay in a luxury hotel with glass elevators whisking you up to a spectacular view of the lake, or in more budget- conscious accommodation, there is always something happening in and around this vibrant city. The larger hotels have their own entertainment programs - poolside fashion shows, talent competitions, guest artist performances - for visitors and children throughout the day.

Yom Ha'atzmaut festivities combine fun, formality

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Kids wearing headgear fashioned out of brightly colored balloons and chomping down on pink candy floss ran amok.

Zaidies and bubbies kvelled with naches as the little tykes played with Doo-Doo the clown.

Adults queued up for a falafel in a pita while others, spurred on by the musical entertainment, did an impromptu hora in the middle of the hall.

People bent over display tables to take a close look at the Judaica, jewelry, and Israeli liqueurs on display.

All in all, the celebrations at the Beth Tzedec Congregation on the eve of Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israeli Independence Day, were a time for simchah and joy.

Later, a more formal community celebration kicked off inside the synagogue's sanctuary as several hundred participants were entertained by the Beth Tzedec Choir followed by an extravaganza of Israeli pop music presented by Yoel Sharabi.

In brief remarks to open the event, Israeli consul-general Dror Zeigerman pointed out that it is difficult to make the transition from Yom Hazikaron, remembering those who gave their lives in Israel's wars, to Yom Ha'atzmaut.

It is particularly difficult, he said, when the Independence Day celebrations are marred by terrorist attacks aimed at derailing the peace process. Some will react and say "stop the process, stop compromise," Zeigerman said. "But those who gave their lives gave Israel the mandate to seek peace," he said.

Israel's eternal capital

Israel wants peace, he continued, adding that Palestinians who will live under autonomy must show they can stop terror and are prepared to live in peace with Israel.

To loud applause, Zeigerman assured the audience that Jerusalem will remain Israel's eternal capital.

Ontario Premier Bob Rae affirmed the province's "commitment to Israel" and referred to Canada's vote at the United Nations in favor of Israel's creation.

The premier referred to a Memorandum of Understanding between Ontario and Israel, that was to be signed on Yom Ha'atzmaut, that will promote trade and technological exchange and strengthen relations between the two jurisdictions.

Kurt Rothschild, president of the Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF), reflected on the accomplishments of Israel in establishing a modern state while gathering in Jews from around the world.

Referring to Israel's desire for peace in the midst of attacks on its citizens, Rothschild said, "We wait in vain for Israel's new friends to express their revulsion to murder."

Actor Harvey Atkin served as the evening's master of cermonies.

The community Yom Ha'atzmaut program continued the next day at the North branch of the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) with a flag-raising ceremony at noon, family entertainment, displays, food and fun for all ages.

The community celebration was organized by the CZF in co-operation with Beth Tzedec Congregation, Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada, the JCC and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Israel warns PLO: don't make any deals with Hamas

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel warned the PLO on Sunday it would scrap the autonomy accords if the PLO cooperates with the extremist Hamas movement.

The self-rule deal will be nullified if the PLO allows Hamas to terrorize Israelis inside the Green Line, in exchange for Hamas cooperation inside Palestinian-controlled areas, Israel said.

Israel Radio reported that in meetings held between senior PLO and Hamas officials last week in Gaza, Hamas suggested it would cooperate with the new Gaza and Jericho police forces if the police ignored its attacks across the Green Line.

At Sunday's cabinet meeting, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said "it is out of the question [the PLO] should even think of achieving cooperation on the basis of attacking Israelis." Other ministers supported Rabin's statements.

"If the PLO has an agreement like this with Hamas, it won't have an agreement with us," warned Environment Minister Yossi Sarid.

Opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu said no clarification was needed, saying the PLO "admitted full cooperation with Hamas murderers."

A PLO official in Gaza said that in Hamas's discussions with Fatah, the PLO's main arm, Hamas never mentioned fomenting violence.

"We wouldn't allow them [Hamas] to say this because the purpose of such a request would be to blow up the peace process. It would be like planting a bomb on our own body. They never raised this request because they know our policy," PLO Gaza spokesman Sufyan Abu Zaydeh said.

Abu Zaydeh said Hamas and the PLO cooperated in matters such as education, but not violence. The two sides came to a verbal agreement to end attacks on one another, Palestinian sources told The Jerusalem Post.

The talks began after violent clashes three weeks ago between the two groups in Rafiah and Khan Yunis, and the kidnapping of a Fatah leader in Sheikh Radwan, which provoked Fatah youths to kidnap a senior administrator at the Islamic University.

In Amman later on Sunday, Hamas said it would stop attacks against Israeli civilians if Israel halted assaults against Palestinians.

"The latest operations in Afula and Hadera [which killed 12 people in suicide bomb attacks and wounded 70 others] ... [are] not a fixed policy of Hamas's Kassam brigades," the group said in a statement reported by Reuters.

The statement appeared to be designed to forestall further actions against the movement in Jordan, following King Hussein's announcement Saturday night that Hamas was not a legal body and only the PLO represented the Palestinians.

But in a weekend statement faxed to Western media, Hamas threatened reprisals against Israeli and Jewish targets throughout the world.

"If the Israeli government ... decides to hit Hamas personalities or political and media offices abroad," warned the statement, "Israeli blood and interests and Jewish communities around the world are open for our strikes."

The statement came after Rabin and foreign minister Shimon Peres accused Jordan of aiding the militant group.

Meantime, Hamas last week urged Israeli Arabs to take safety precautions and not travel on Israeli buses.

Hamas has announced plans for three additional terrorist attacks in reprisal for the Feb. 25 Hebron massacre, when an Israeli settler killed at least 29 Palestinians praying at the town's Tomb of the Patriarchs.

A spokesman for the Council of Arab Municipality Heads has denounced Hamas's call to Israeli Arabs not to use the country's buses.

The Israeli Arab spokesman said council members viewed the Hamas appeal as an attempt to drive a wedge between Jews and Arabs in Israel, a move Israeli Arabs have rejected, he said.

The Israeli government has meanwhile decided that the closure of the territories — which was announced after the Afula attack — will continue but will be eased slightly.

Government officials have stated that 20,000 permits to enter and work in Israel will be allocated to Palestinians in the territories.

About 16,000 of the permits will be issued on "humanitarian grounds" to merchants, medical personnel, lawyers and journalists. The remaining permits will be issued to agricultural workers who are more than 35 years old.

In an effort to alleviate some of the economic hardships caused by the closure, Israel's cabinet on Sunday allocated approximately $10 million for public works programs and humanitarian aid in the Gaza Strip.

Netanyahu tops Rabin in poll

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — If an election for prime minister of Israel were held today, Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu would win with 44 per cent of the vote, compared to 38 per cent for Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, according to the results of a poll by Gallup-Israel. Eighteen per cent of respondents were undecided.

This is the first time since Netanyahu's election as Likud party chairman that he has topped Rabin in such a poll. However, in a three-way race in which Tsomet leader Rafael Eitan would also be a candidate, Rabin would receive the largest number of votes — 34 per cent — to Netanyahu's 29 per cent and Eitan's 18 per cent. The margin of error is plus or minus 4 per cent.

The survey, taken at regular intervals, shows a steady decline in Rabin's popularity, from a peak of 44 per cent in a three-way race and 49 per cent against Netanyahu's 34 per cent in a two-way match, according to a Jan. 31 poll.

Toronto remembers victims of Nazism

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Elsa Chandler remembers Bergen-Belsen. Even after 50 years, the nightmares still haunt her. She recalls the wrenching smell of death that engulfed the barracks in which she and her mother endured torture, starvation and disease. Those terrible memories, she says, remain too fresh, too painful, and too distressing to allow her to speak of them without succumbing emotionally.

Chandler was the keynote speaker at the Yom Hashoah commemoration on April 10. The service, presented by the Holocaust remembrance committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, began at the Yad Vashem Monument in Earl Bales Park. A hushed crowd of over 300, many of them survivors of concentration camps, listened to a reading of the list of names of people who perished under the Nazis, now permanently enshrined in the Hall of Memories of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto.

The event commemorated the 50th anniversary of the deportation of the Hungarian Jews. Speaking on their behalf was George Salamon, who was 14 at the time.

"In 1941 there were nearly 800,000 Jews in Hungary," he said. "By 1945, more than 600,000 had perished at the hands of the Nazis and their all-too-willing collaborators. This comprised 10 per cent of those murdered in the Holocaust. The fear we all felt then, is still very real to us today. We cannot forget."

From Earl Bales, the group marched in silent procession to the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation. The reading of the names resumed as the marchers entered the synagogue, and continued until all were seated. The air was charged with disquiet. Everyone seemed bound up in their own thoughts. Faces expressed more eloquently than words the torment endured every day. Agony was reflected in weary eyes that once witnessed the worst crimes of inhumanity, that never again saw friends and loved ones who were shipped off to the camps, and that see a world today once again gripped by rising anti-Semitism and racism.

Rosie Parnass, chair of the 1994 Yom Hashoah service, said in her introduction, "as attitudes and acts of racism have increased over the last year in Canada and internationally, it has become essential to remember the past and encourage the community as a whole to abolish all forms of racism and take a stand against oppression, degradation and all manner of discrimination."

Dror Zeigerman, Israel's consul general, pointed out that the State of Israel owes its existence to the six million lives that were snuffed out. "The world must learn from the Holocaust that evil must be uprooted wherever it lurks and racism eradicated." Comparing the terror of the Nazis to the terrorism experienced today in acts against the Israeli nation, Zeigerman pledged his government's unswerving resolve to fight Palestinian aggression "to the end."

Elsa Chandler spoke about her experiences in Nazi-occupied Poland. She admits that speaking about that period in her life remains difficult, almost impossible. "In my former capacity as Chair of the North York Board of Education, I never spoke of it in a public forum," she said. "Now, I believe the time has come to tell my story."

Her voice cracking with emotion, Chandler recounted the days of her youth spent in Plaszow, near Krakow. This was the labor-turned-concentration camp where Oskar Schindler found the workers for his factory. "My family was not one of those saved by Schindler. My father and brother were killed by the Nazis earlier in the Second World War. My brother was one of the children burned by the Germans in Lwow, Galicia. Father was one of the 'intelligentsia' the Nazis so reviled and did away with as soon as they took control of the country." Chandler herself was 10 years old; she was transported to a number of ghettos and camps, finally arriving in Bergen-Belsen shortly before its liberation.

"Those were horrific months," Chandler continued with tears welling, at times choking her words. "What did a child of only 10 do to be assaulted by such terrible traumas that plague me even now? I can smell the disease-ridden people of the camp barracks. My mother eventually contracted typhoid and it was left to me to place her broken body onto the death wagons. I remember there were so many bodies on those wagons, some of them not yet dead. Why did the Germans keep running their death factories at full tilt right up until the end when they knew full well the war was finished? Why did the trains run almost unimpeded to the concentration camps when all else lay mostly in ruins? No one can answer these questions."

Chandler also recalled how the Germans dug mass graves outside the camp in a last desperate effort to erase any remaining evidence of what they had done.

Chandler concluded by reiterating the words of Steven Spielberg upon his acceptance of the Academy Award for Schindler's List. His was a plea to all educators to teach the lessons of the Holocaust; to listen to the ghosts and echoes of those who perished; and never to allow the Holocaust to become but a footnote in the history books.

"We, as survivors and Jews, should never become complacent again," said Chandler. "We must remain strong as a people, united as a community and dedicated to Israel." Only this will ensure our future in a still very cruel world.

Danes' heroic efforts recognized

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — At a standing room only Yom Hashoah ceremony, the Ottawa Jewish community honored the people of Denmark for their courageous rescue of the Danish Jewish community 50 years ago during World War II.

"It is a story not of one [Oskar] Schindler," said Zvi Urim, an Ottawa teacher who as a 2-year-old was smuggled out of Nazi-occupied Denmark with his family. "It is a story of thousands of Schindlers, a nation of Schindlers, the people of Denmark."

After the Germans invaded Denmark in 1940, Urim recounted, they gave the small agricultural country a large measure of independence. The Germans were depending on the goodwill of the Danes to ensure a supply of fresh milk, meat and other supplies. So they left the government alone and they left the Jews alone. Jewish schools continued to operate and Urim's father, a university student in Copenhagen, continued his studies long after Jews in other European countries had lost that right.

However, in 1943, the Germans complained to the Danish government about the increasing activity of the resistance movement. They demanded a crackdown. When the Danish government refused to co-operate and resigned in protest, the German army marched into Copenhagen. A month later, word got out that a Nazi round-up of the Jews was planned for Rosh Hashanah.

The Jews prepared to go underground while the rest of the Danish community mobilized to help them. Ambulances were dispatched to pick up Jews and bring them to hospitals where they were admitted and registered under traditional Danish names. Offers came in from neighbors and strangers to provide safe hiding places. As Jews fled the city, they were picked up by strangers, even taxi drivers, and offered places to hide.

Most Jews headed to the coast, where fishing boats and small pleasure boats were used to ferry them at night to safety in Sweden. Even though boats were confiscated and the waters patrolled by the German army, the evacuation continued until 7,200 of Denmark's 7,700 Jews had been taken to Sweden.

When they arrived in Sweden, said Urim, the Jews were met by gentiles who brought blankets and food and took the Jews into their homes.

Meanwhile, the remaining 500 Jews in Denmark, mostly the elderly and Jews who lived in the provinces, were deported to the Theresienstadt concentration camp across the border in Germany. After persistent lobbying by delegations of Danes who visited the camp, the Danish Jews were released and escorted out by the Red Cross. The returning Jews were greeted in Denmark by villagers bearing flowers and then eventually ferried to Sweden.

To mark the 50th anniversary of the extraordinary rescue, Urim, on behalf of the Holocaust Remembrance Committee, presented a plaque honoring the Danish people, to the ambassador of Denmark, Jorgen Behnke. A garden of 120 trees was also planted in Israel in honor of the Danes.

Lea Kalin, chair of the Holocaust Remembrance Committee, said she was gratified by the large turnout of over 600 people at this year's Yom Hashoah observance.

Message from Prime Minister of Israel:

Unique opportunity exists in Israel's quest for peace

April 1994

Dear Friends,

I extend my heartfelt greetings from united Jerusalem, the eternal capital of Israel and the spiritual center of the entire Jewish people, on behalf of the Government of Israel, to the Jewish communities in the Diaspora on the occasion of Israel's Day of Independence.

Every year, Independence Day and in particular Memorial Day which precedes it, bring back the memories of our first day of independence, in 1948, when my fellow soldiers and I were in the midst of the Battle of Jerusalem. Nineteen years later, I was fated to be the chief of staff when Jerusalem was reunited during the Six-Day War. None of us will forget those who did not return. It is their legacy that commands us to do our utmost for peace and security for our nation.

And indeed, as the founders of our country gathered together to declare the establishment of the Jewish State 46 years ago, they did so with the full knowledge of the great sacrifices necessary to transform the Zionist vision into reality. They extended a hand of peace and good neighborly relations. At the time, it was in vain. We successfully built a new country, a new society, but peace eluded us.

Today, a unique opportunity exists to succeed in our quest, to continue the effort begun with Egypt, to succeed. Like the generations before us, we will not allow the acts of the enemies of peace, whoever they may be, to dispel our determination to achieve our objective. Though it may tarry, peace will come.

Nonetheless, I want to reassure you that in our area there will be no change whatsoever — the security of the State of Israel, the security of all the inhabitants, as well as the security of Jews abroad.

As Israel makes the transition from conflict to conciliation, we invite you to be partners in the great success story that is Israel. Israel is the centre of our common Jewish being, of our identity and our heritage, and your contribution and involvement are as essential as ever. At the same time, Israel must find ways of working together with you to ensure the thriving continuity of the Jewish people. Israel and world Jewry as one people will master the formidable challenges of a new era. Visiting Israel, sending your children for education here, investing in Israel, and above all — making aliyah, are the ways and means to ensure Jewish links and Jewish identity.

The road before us is paved with unprecedented opportunities and complex decisions. Yet, with hard work, perseverance and cooperation, I believe we will move closer to our goals and to the goals of the founders of the state: to be a free nation in a secure and peaceful Jewish homeland.

OSI keeping a close watch on suspected war criminals

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The United States is stopping suspected Nazi war criminals from entering by way of Canada, according to the acting director of the U.S. federal government's special task force for the investigation and prosecution of Nazi war criminals.

Since 1979 the U.S. Justice Department's Office of Special Investigation (OSI) has compiled a watch list of more than 70,000 "excludable aliens" who served in military units that took part in Nazi crimes, said Eli Rosenbaum.

OSI, he continued, gets a call almost every week from an official at a U.S. port of entry who spots someone on the list.

"Some of them ... live in Canada, and show up trying to get in, and we send them back," he said.

The 38-year-old lawyer spoke at a recent lecture presented by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem and Beth Tzedec Holocaust memorial committee.

He told the audience at Beth Tzedec that the watch list, the largest data base of its kind in the world, is the work of OSI historians who search archives worldwide looking for the surviving remnants of Nazi personnel rosters.

When the name of a suspected war criminal is found, either through historical research or a tip from a foreign government, he said, it is checked against the U.S. Immigration Service data base of people who immigrated to the U.S. this century. If OSI gets a name match, Rosenbaum added, an investigation begins. If there is no match, the name is added to the list.

Rosenbaum recalled a name match given to the OSI: Stefan Leili, a former guard at the Mauthausen concentration camp in Austria. "We confirmed that Leili was still alive, living in the United States, and we assigned an attorney, an investigator and a historian to develop the case," he said.

In the U.S. National Archive, the historian found damning evidence against the former S.S. member. Using Nazi records that listed murdered prisoners, the historian identified Leili as a killer. Leili, Rosenbaum noted, eventually confessed and was deported to Germany, "where he lives today as a free man."

Rosenbaum explained it is difficult for Germany to make a case against a war criminal. Under German law, the prosecution of murder is subject to a statute of limitations, unless it can be proven that the crime was motivated by racial hatred. Fifty years later, he said, it is hard to prove racial hatred was in the mind of the perpetrator when he committed the crime.

Since OSI was established in 1979, 41 war criminals have been deported from the United States and three have been extradited. As war crimes do not fall under U.S. criminal laws, OSI prosecutes war criminals under immigration and naturalization laws.

A case is first prosecuted in federal court, Rosenbaum said, with the hope of obtaining an order cancelling the person's U.S. citizenship. If the prosecution succeeds, defence lawyers can appeal the decision at the Court of Appeals and at the U.S. Supreme Court. If the decision of the federal court holds, the OSI goes to the U.S. Immigration Court, which has "its own layers of appeal."

Defence lawyers use appeals as delaying tactics, he said, as they know their elderly clients could die before a deportation order is final.

Last year OSI filed more cases than any other year in its history because the fall of Soviet Union opened archives that had been closed since the end of World War II. He said this was a landmark in the prosecution of war criminals, because people who thought they were going to get away with war crimes will not do so.

Holocaust deniers take aim at discrediting Schindler's List

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Steven Spielberg's Oscar winning film Schindler's List is still in first run, but a variety of Holocaust-deniers have already taken aim at the movie, hoping to discourage people from seeing it.

Toronto neo-Nazi Ernst Zundel, former British Columbia Social Credit candidate John Ball and Vancouver journalist Doug Collins have all attacked the film. The Canadian Liberty Net's telephone message in Vancouver describes the film as "a masterpiece of propaganda."

These attacks attest to the desperation felt by Holocaust-deniers as a result of the power of the movie, said Canadian Jewish Congress spokesman Steven Shulman. It shows "the tremendous impact Schindler's List is having on the popular culture and awareness of the Holocaust," he said.

The film "has been a tremendous setback for them. They're grasping at straws trying to counteract it."

In a recent address to the sisterhood of the Shaar Shalom Synagogue, Congress' director of community relations Bernie Farber said the film may reawaken boards of education across the country and get them to include curricula on Holocaust studies. The movie also serves as an antidote to the lies spewed by the likes of Zundel, he said.

In a recent collaboration by Zundel and Ball (Ball testified on Zundel's behalf at his second trial for denying the Holocaust), the pair claim to expose the movie as "lies and hate."

Zundel calls for help in a "worldwide campaign to ban Schindler's List."

Writing in Vancouver's North Shore News, Collins refers to the film as "Swindler's List," after referring to the "billions of dollars still being paid out in compensation to Israel and 'survivors' of whom there seem to be an endless number."

Collins refers to the figure of six million Jewish victims of the Nazis as "nonsense" and he suggests Spielberg made the movie to "cash in" on years of propaganda about the Holocaust.

"As the Zundels of the world attempt to gain a foothold, Schindler's List provides a needed antidote," Farber said.

He pointed out that Spielberg, in conjunction with Universal Pictures and the Life Time Learning Systems, has compiled a study kit and viewer's guide to the movie.

It asks participants to examine responsibility for actions and to keep a journal describing their feelings about events that disturb them.

Farber said one of the best educational tools for young people remains a visit to a Holocaust memorial followed by a "hands-on discussion with an actual Holocaust survivor."

Ottawa votes to delay school year

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Ottawa Board of Education voted last week to delay the first day of school to Sept. 8 in order to avoid conflicting with Rosh Hashanah, which falls on Sept 6.

Board trustees had a lengthy debate about the matter two weeks earlier but were unable to reach a decision.

The issue was then referred to the teachers' unions and senior administrative staff. Senior staff recommended that the first day of school be delayed to accommodate the board's estimated 1,500 Jewish students.

A Sept. 8 school start date was also supported by the board's multiculturalism advisory committee and by the National Capital Alliance on Race Relations.

Only one trustee, Brian Mackey, voted against the motion, saying he didn't think a secular school board should adjust the school calendar for religious reasons.

Ron Singer, chair of the community relations committee of the Jewish Community Council, explained that although Jewish students and teachers normally take time off school for the Jewish Holy Day, missing the first two days of orientation would be a disadvantage for them.

"We do not see this as a Jewish issue but one of multiculturalism," Singer said. "The Jewish Community Council of Ottawa and Canadian Jewish Congress would support just as strongly a modification of the school calendar if any religion's major holy day fell on the first day of school."

Four of six Metro Toronto school boards have already decided to begin school on Sept. 8. The York Region Board of Education, north of Toronto, has followed suit. [CJN, April 7].

"These boards have not only given comfort to their Jewish constituents and assured them they are welcome in the public school system, they have sent a positive message to all minorities in our schools," Singer said.

The Carleton Board of Education which runs suburban and rural schools in the Ottawa area has decided to start the school year on Sept. 6, the day after Labor Day.

However, Ruth Kahane, director of community relations for the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa said her committee will request that the board reconsider the matter.

According to the lunar calendar which determines the timing of Jewish holidays, Rosh Hashanah will only coincide with the first day of school every 30 to 40 years.

Canadian woman gets first-ever synagogue administrator designation

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The executive director of Winnipeg's Shaarey Zedek Synagogue became the first Canadian woman to be designated a Fellow in Synagogue Administration during the eight-day North American Association of Synagogue Executives (NAASE) convention in Israel.

Perle Flam Selch was made a fellow in February following work she did on a paper for NAASE. There are 37 synagogue executive directors who have earned the designation including Selch's fellow Canadians Morris Klians (Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Westmount), who chaired the convention, and David Moscovitz (Shaare Zion in Montreal).

Selch is one of a growing number of women who are filling North American synagogue directorships.

"It used to be that synagogues looked to accountants and people with strong backgrounds in business administration for the position," she said. "Today, there is more emphasis on family life and programing skills and a strong background in Judaica."

Originally from Winnipeg, Selch came to the Shaarey Zedek, this city's largest congregation, in 1988 after having lived in the United States and Israel for many years. She immediately initiated monthly meetings for fellow synagogue administrators.

She helped start the community Pesach seders, which rotate among the synagogues each year, and the new community crisis committee to help the Jewish community cope with tragedy.

She has been asked to chair Chaverim, a new committee which will link regional NAASE members through regular meetings to provide mutual support.

As to the recent NAASE annual convention, Selch said it was important to have it in Israel every few years. The guides, she reports, were wonderful and knowledgeable about the Masorati or Conservative movement which, she notes, is starting to flower in Israel.

Selch said the Conservative movement is also very active in Russia where it is operating numerous Jewish camps and schools.

Ontario signs economic agreement with Israel

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario Premier Bob Rae signed a far-reaching economic agreement with Israel during last week's annual Yom Ha'atzmaut reception at Queen's Park, one he hopes will point the way toward a Canada-Israel free trade accord.

Before some 250 Jewish community leaders, Rae put his signature on a "summary of understanding" that will help promote co-operation and "strategic alliances" between Israeli and Ontario companies.

The groundwork for the accord was laid during Rae's trip to the Mideast in December and January, when he led over a dozen Ontario business leaders on an economic mission to Israel, the territories and Jordan.

The document will be signed in Israel by Industry and Trade Minister Micha Harish.

Rae told the gathering that the "logical next step" is the signing of a free trade accord between Israel and Canada to eliminate what he called a Canadian "tariff disadvantage."

Ontario is planning to welcome an Israeli business delegation in the coming weeks, the premier added.

The agreement commits Israel and Ontario to encourage

- the establishment of direct channels for the exchange of information on business opportunities in Israel, Ontario and other parts of Canada;
- review of data banks in order to identify potential joint projects;
- efforts to locate potential partners for high-tech and turnkey projects in Ontario, Israel and the rest of Canada, particularly in the fields of energy, telecommunications, medical equipment, aviation, space and construction, as well as agricultural, hydro and environmental projects;
- joint research and development projects, via the planned Canada-Israel R&D Foundation and through existing programs;
- an Ontario seminar for Israeli companies, to be held in Toronto later this year, on Doing Business in Ontario;
- and the negotiation of a Canada-Israel free trade accord.

Rae said the deal "takes relations between Ontario and Israel to new levels," and he spoke glowingly of "the new economy" emerging in the Middle East.

The premier joined Citizenship Minister Elaine Ziemba, Liberal Leader Lyn McLeod, Tory chief Mike Harris, legislature members and Israel's consul general in Toronto, Dror Zeigerman, in toasting the Jewish state on its 46th birthday.

Communal representation included Canadian Jewish Congress president Irving Abella, B'nai Brith Canada president Gabriel Nachman, State of Israel Bonds leaders and several rabbis.

In the face of recent attacks on Israeli civilians, Zeigerman noted that Israel is determined "to win this war against terrorism, just as we have won on the battlefield. We will overcome."

He called on radical Arab groups "to stop this terror, recognize Israel within secure borders and implement the [self-rule] accord."

Israel's economy is expected to grow by six per cent this year and Zeigerman said he hopes the deal with Ontario "will open a new era" in relations.

Moments earlier in the legislature, Rae rose to speak about Yom Ha'atzmaut.

"It is difficult for me to find the words to express my own feelings on this occasion," the premier said.

He noted that Tory Leader Harris recently returned from a trip to Israel. "I'm sure he experienced, as I did, the sense of vibrancy, the tremendous dynamism of Israeli society ... its outward look to the world, the determination of its people, as well as the sense of being on the edge of enormous change, which always brings with it great emotional and personal challenges for all of us.

"The Canadian Jewish community had a very important role to play in the struggle for independence," Rae said. "All Canadians, through their governments, were supportive and very much involved in the organization of the state of Israel and in the preservation of the peace in 1956, again in 1967 and in 1973, and it's been a long, long association we've had. As premier, I'm enormously proud of this relationship.

"But above all, it's important for us on this day to express our solidarity with the people of Israel, with the Jewish community in this country, which is such an important part of my own life."

Halifax Jews celebrate Israel's 46th birthday

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — Organizers of Yom Ha'atzmaut in Halifax planned for an attendance of 125 people.

They were wrong.

At least 250 attended an Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC) Israel Independence Day gala at Beth Israel Synagogue April 17, which filled the social hall with singing and dancing and noshing on traditional Israeli food.

"We were more than delighted with the turnout," said AJC president Larry Freeman as he and a group of volunteers hastily brought out more Jaffa oranges after a light lunch of falafel, hummus, techina and vegetables quickly disappeared from the tables. "But we apologize that we ran out of food."

A telephone poll a few days earlier generated 110 positive responses to the program. Freeman and his committee added 10 per cent — considerably short of the eventual in-person attendance.

It's a dilemma he hopes occurs more often. "It was a great community event. We had both Hebrew schools involved (from Shaar Shalom and Beth Israel congregations) and lots of parents and grandparents came out to see their children perform."

He said the goal of the AJC this year has been continuity and satisfying the region's craving for community involvement. "People want to identify and they can't always do that in a religious service. We need this type of event, a happy celebration for the whole community, to bring us all together."

Isaac and Herman, an Israeli musical duo based in Toronto, sang a selection of Israeli and traditional Hebrew songs, bringing loud ovations from a singing and hand-clapping audience.

"This brings a lot of Israel home to me," said Gali Salamon, the shlichah in the Atlantic region who is eight months into her first of two years on the job. "The Israeli decorations in the hall, the music, the Hebrew words, all give us a sense of unity."

Similar celebrations were held in St. John's Nfld., April 16, with Isaac and Herman performing, and in Moncton April 17, highlighted by an Israeli lunch and Hebrew school performance.

Mary Fisher

Mary Fisher's energy and quiet strength bely the fact that she harbors a deadly virus. An artist and mother who once served as assistant to (then) U.S. president Gerald Ford, Fisher learned that she was HIV positive in July 1991 after her ex-husband became ill.

Fisher, the Detroit-born daughter of industrialist and philanthropist Max Fisher (founding chair of the Jewish Agency), will speak at Toronto's Roy Thomson Hall on May 9. Her talk is part of the Unique Lives & Experiences series to raise money for the Hospital for Sick Children.

Fisher has become an internationally recognized crusader for AIDS awareness. She continues her work through the Family AIDS Network, a national organization which she founded two years ago when she was living in Boca Raton, Florida. She has since moved to Washington, D.C., where the Network is now based.

CJN: Where do you get the strength of character to do what you're doing?

Fisher: I don't know. I believe that there's a reason for everything, and that gives me strength. My children give me strength. Helping other people gives me strength, and knowing that there's a possibility of making a difference makes me feel as if I can at least try to make change.

CJN: Do you feel your Jewish background has an impact on what you're doing today?

Fisher: Well, certainly my belief in God has kept me centred at many moments. I believe that the values I learned in my home have helped me teach my children how we are going to deal with this.

I don't know if I can specifically say as a Jew I feel differently than I do as just a human being.

CJN: Do you find support within the Jewish community?

Fisher: Some Jewish communities are very supportive and others are not. They're like any other community. It runs the gamut.

CJN: How can a community best be supportive?

Fisher: I think that all communities need to respond in a way that will allow people to talk openly and honestly without fear of job loss, insurance loss, or even friendship loss. If we could get rid of the stigma, I believe that we could all deal with the illness.

And we have to make provisions for taking care of people who are infected. That's going to become a worse problem as time goes on, because there are going to be more and more people approaching the illness stage of this, as we are increasing our infections daily.

CJN: Are you referring to hospices?

Fisher: I'm not just talking about dying care. That's important, but I'm also talking about medical care. I'm talking about doctors being willing to treat patients who are HIV positive and learning to recognize symptoms of opportunistic infections.

Part of the problem is that our medical community will look, for example, at a woman and say, 'Well, you're not that type of woman, so you don't need to get a test.' In the meantime, the woman could pass this disease on to somebody else because she doesn't know. That's dangerous.

I think that we have to educate. We have to give money to research and encourage the private sector to spend the money, energy and time to work with governments to find treatments and a cure, and to work towards a vaccine for those children — our children — and our peers who are not infected.

It's a global issue. It's not an epidemic of one community or another. Heterosexual adolescents and women are the fastest rising group, because we're unprepared. We deny that it could be us. Three-fourths of the hemophiliac community in America has been erased by this disease.

CJN: You have been quoted as saying that both you and your father work within the system until the system doesn't work any more. How has the system worked for you, and how has it not worked?

Fisher: The system works when it gives me the opportunity to speak to people who might not ordinarily hear this message, for example, the [1992 Republican] convention, but a political system is a rough system to try and change. It's very difficult to take something as intense as death and politicize it.

CJN: What do your children know of your work and your HIV status?

Fisher: My children are very young. [They're 4 and 6, and have tested negative for the virus.] I don't believe that they totally understand the process of this disease. We had to deal with their father's death last year, and I was reluctant to put them in a situation that made them feel less than stable. I would not say to them, 'This is what's going to happen to your mom.'

They hear me speak. They wear their AIDS ribbon. They don't necessarily understand the HIV part, because I'm not sick. It's difficult to explain to children.

CJN: What would you tell other parents about teaching their children about AIDS?

Fisher: [For] young children, I think that it's important to know that the disease exists. I believe that what parents need to teach their children at any age is compassion for people who are sick or [who] might need help.

As a child grows, I think that it's up to the parent, when the parent feels comfortable, to talk about AIDS and about how you get the disease and how you don't.

CJN: A lot of parents don't feel comfortable talking about intimacy. Can you suggest some sort of door in for them?

Fisher: You could talk about the fact that you can be intimate without having intercourse. Intimacy can be hugging and kissing and loving and cuddling. Parents can explain that you can have relationships of intimacy without having sexual experiences until you're ready.

If parents feel uncomfortable, they have to get over it, because we're not talking about any kind of moral agenda or religious agenda. We're talking about a health issue.

The truth is that 75 per cent of all young people [in the United States] are having sexual experiences by the time they're 16. We have to give our children the options, [tell them] how they can protect themselves, or else our love is not what we are [professing] it to be. If I love you, I'm going to tell you how you can save your life. Parents have to be really clear.

CJN: What do you think is the biggest misconception regarding AIDS or HIV?

Fisher: That it is only a gay disease is probably one of the largest tools of denial. It's easier to think that it's somebody else's problem. [That] is changing, [but] I don't think it's changing fast enough.

We tend to want to forget that this is an infectious epidemic. You can't catch cancer. You can't catch heart disease. There's a lot of confusion around that.

I think that we have a tendency, because it's difficult to track HIV infection, to report just AIDS deaths or AIDS cases. And the numbers aren't wrong, but it gives us a lower number to deal with, because you talk about the people who were infected 10 or 12 years ago. It has nothing to do with new infections.

CJN: Why is it so difficult to track new infections?

Fisher: Many people who are HIV positive haven't been tested. If my husband hadn't gotten sick, I never would have been tested, because I didn't think I was at risk.

CJN: How has the medical outlook changed over the past 10 years for people with HIV?

Fisher: Not much. We have more [treatments] which will stave off symptoms, but we don't have any anti-virals that will really prolong life.

I believe that one of the reasons doctors have such a difficult time with this is because they have no answers. They're unable to work as partners with people with HIV. They have been set up, and they set themselves up to [provide] answers to questions, to be able to provide life, and they cannot provide life in this situation.

I believe that AIDS in many instances has changed the way a tremendous [number] of doctors, at least in America, look at health care.

It goes for anyone facing a terminal illness. A doctor cannot say to me for example, 'I think you should do this.' He can say, 'These are your options. What would you like to do?' And that's a very scary situation for a doctor as well as a patient.

CJN: How are family and friends affected when someone close to them is diagnosed HIV-positive?

Fisher: I think that family and friends need to go through some of the same grief process as a person who is infected. You're dealing with a lot of issues, you're dealing with children in many instances — at least in my case. You're dealing with changing the way you look at priorities within your life.

CJN: How would you describe the process for the person who is HIV positive?

Fisher: It's obviously a very personal process. I think that if the initial reaction, which is almost always shock and anger and fear and pain, can give way to some acceptance, and then turn negative emotions into positive energy, it can certainly help one. It helps me to be more positive, more productive. I think the process is really devastating. It's frightening. It's horrible.

CJN: How long does it take to come to terms with it?

Fisher: I think it's different for every person. It's my hope that people have enough support around them when they do find out that they can come through this as quickly as possible so that they can go about living with HIV or AIDS rather than dying from it.

CJN: What is the best way to support someone who's just been diagnosed?

Fisher: To just be there. To be loving, to be honest, but most of all it's to be there.

CJN: Is there anything people shouldn't do?

Fisher: I think it would be a mistake not to find out the facts about AIDS. I think we all need to. Actually it could be dangerous for the people you talk to about the disease [if you don't know] how you get it and how you don't get it.

This is not a casually transmitted disease. It's not easy to get unless you are in intimate contact with a person who is infected, intimate meaning sharing blood or bodily fluids such as semen — things that happen when you are having sexual intercourse. You can get it through unprotected sexual contact with someone who is infected, by sharing needles with an infected person, [or it can be passed] from [an infected] mother in utero or through her breast milk. You don't get it by kissing, and you don't get it by hugging and touching and loving and going out to lunch with somebody.

CJN: And yet there are still people who are afraid to get near to somebody...

Fisher: You can't get it that way. That's important for people to know. It can be devastating to someone who has just found out that they're positive when all of a sudden a person doesn't want to touch them. You've been touching them for years — they're your friend, your child, your mom or your dad, and all of a sudden you don't want to get near them.

CJN: What is the most important message that you want to get across to the public?

Fisher: This is a disease of all of us, and we are all at risk. Once people begin to understand that, I hope they become a little more compassionate, maybe put some action behind their feelings.

It's really important for people to understand that the testing process, as difficult as it is, is important. When we know we have the disease, we don't pass the disease on.

CJN: Do you think everyone should have the test?

Fisher: Other than those who in their own hearts can say, 'I have never had an unprotected sexual encounter, I have never shared a needle, [and] 10 years ago never had a blood transfusion,' — other than that, I think we should all be tested, and understand what that process means.

A negative test, if you've been in sexual encounters around that time, doesn't necessarily mean that you're negative. You need to have another test. The body builds up antibodies to this virus; sometimes it takes a while for the antibodies to develop.

A person has to be honest with themselves and with those that they say they love. It's not something you fool around with. It can happen, and all it takes is one time. You don't have to be promiscuous. You just have to be a human being, and the virus can find you.

JDC brings humanitarian efforts to Bosnia

Jews leave Sarajevo

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — On February 5, 296 residents of the embattled city of Sarajevo clambered on board a group of specially-chartered buses that were to ferry them away from the carnage and indiscriminate killing that has become commonplace in the Bosnian capital.

As if to remind them of the reason they were leaving, an artillery shell came crashing down only 200 metres away, killing 65 people. The buses quickly departed and after a difficult journey past numerous military checkpoints, the 296 found safety in Markarska, Croatia.

The convoy was the 12th evacuation of Sarajevo co-ordinated by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (the Joint) and like the evacuations that preceded it, was carried out in a non-sectarian manner.

One of the passengers on board was Zajniba Hartaga-Susic, a 77-year-old Bosnian Muslim woman who had been named a Righteous Gentile for helping save Jews during World War II. Another on board was a Jewish woman named Rachela who had been separated from her family for 22 months. Both were later welcomed to Israel as new immigrants.

Their heartwarming stories were related recently by Beila Matusof, a desk officer of the Joint with responsibility for the former Yugoslavia, Slovakia, the Czech Republic and the Baltic states.

During a brief visit in Toronto, she spoke to a group of communal professionals at a staff development day of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto as well as to the international affairs committee of Canadian Jewish Congress. She also met with a select group of United Jewish Appeal donors.

The Joint is still in need of medical supplies, clothing and food to help stock its storehouses in Sarajevo, Matusof said. La Benevolencia, the Sarajevo Jewish community's philanthropic organization, supplies 15 per cent of the medical supplies available in the besieged Bosnian capital and, with the Joint's help, it has a team of doctors available to make house calls for those unable to come to the community centre for treatment, she said.

Outlining the Joint's humanitarian relief efforts, Matusof said that, in conjunction with La Benevolencia, it runs a soup kitchen serving 300 people a day on a non-sectarian basis. The Joint distributed thick plastic sheeting purchased in Israel so that hospitals, homes and public institutions could cover windows destroyed by shelling. It operates the only three pharmacies in Sarajevo, providing free medication to 60,000 people per month.

The Joint has also set up a radio link between Sarajevo and its offices in Zagreb, Croatia, allowing Sarajevo residents to stay in touch with friends and relatives.

Matusof called for assistance to help the Joint carry on its humanitarian work in the former Yugoslavia. She pointed out that the organization is on good terms with all factions in Bosnia and as a consequence was able to organize the 12 rescue operations — three airlifts and nine bus convoys.

She said that most of Sarajevo's Jews have left. Of the city's current population of 300,000, only about 350 are Jews. Another 200 Jews reside in other parts of Bosnia, down from a pre-war population estimated at 1,600. As of March 1994, the Joint had rescued more than 2,100 people, of which 1,001 were Jews.

Turning her attention to other projects of the Joint, Matusof, who grew up in Morocco, said one-third of the organization's $60 million budget is allocated to projects in Israel to help the elderly and the handicapped. Some funds go for job retraining and youth aliyah.

The Joint is also involved in remote corners of the globe, she said. It provides social services to approximately 8,500 Jews in China, Burma and India. In Latin America, it provides technical assistance and aid in leadership development, while in Cuba, the Joint has arranged for a rabbi from Mexico and for a youth worker to serve the community's 1,200 Jews.

The Joint provides social services to Jews in Morocco, Tunisia and even Algeria, where a scattering of elderly Jews still resides, she said.

In the former Soviet Union, the Joint operates programs in 80 cities where it helps local Jews set up their own infrastructure for schools, homes for the eldery and libraries.

Established in 1914, the Joint operates in more than 70 countries fulfilling its original mandate to help Jews in need through rescue, relief and rehabilitation, Matusof said.

The News in Brief

Canada Condemns Hadera Deaths

OTTAWA — The federal government condemned last week's terrorist attack in Hadera, which left six dead and some 30 wounded.

According to Department of Foreign Affairs spokesman Rodney Moore, Ottawa "condemned this act of violence" and expressed "deep sympathies" to Israel's Embassy.

Canada also "applauds the willingness" of Israel and the PLO not to let the incident impede talks on Palestinian self-rule. Ottawa issued a similar statement following this month's suicide bomb attack in Afula, in which eight Israeli civilians were killed.

Community Reaction to Hadera

TORONTO — The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) condemned the Hadera attack. National chair Daniel Pekarsky said the incident "underscores the need for PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat to exercise effective discipline over all Palestinian factions."

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) called on Arafat to "immediately condemn [the bombing], categorically and without qualification."

B'nai Brith Canada described Arafat's response as "tepid and insufficient," and called on the PLO to control Palestinian extremists and honor its commitment to renounce violence.

Peat Marwick Donation

TORONTO — KPMG Peat Marwick, one of the world's largest accounting firms, will donate $250,000 over the next five years to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.

"The firm is making this contribution because we strongly support the value of human diversity," said Chairman Jon Madonna in announcing the donation. "The Holocaust museum makes it painfully clear what happens when prejudice goes unchallenged."

Peat Marwick came under fire about a year ago for not including Israel in its international directory of offices. The firm was accused of complying with the Arab economic boycott of Israel.

Israel's Population Rises

JERUSALEM — On its 46th birthday, Israel has roughly 5,350,000 inhabitants, according to the Central Bureau of Statistics here.

The total represents an increase of 115,000, or 2.2 per cent over the year before.

The population figures, which are released annually on Yom Ha'atzmaut, indicate that two-thirds of this year's increase is due to births rather than immigration.

Israelis are dispersed over some 1,170 towns, villages and small settlements, according to the Bureau of Statistics, and 17 Israeli cities now have populations in excess of 100,000, compared with only 11 a year ago.

During the past year, the bureau reported, some 71,000 immigrants came to Israel, the vast majority from the former Soviet Union. But overall, immigration was down by 15 per cent over the previous year.

Settler Kills Pregnant Woman

JERUSALEM — A settler from the West Bank town of Shiloh was detained by police for the shooting death last week of a pregnant Palestinian woman.

The shooting occurred after Palestinian youths from the village of El-Jib, near Ramallah, threw stones at the settler's truck.

According to witnesses and Israeli military sources, the settler got out of his truck, pulled out his pistol and shot at one of the village homes.

A bullet went through the window of the home and fatally wounded 18-year-old Fatma Khaleifa, who was three months pregnant and the mother of an eight-month-old baby girl. The child was unharmed.

The settler fled but was later caught near Jerusalem.

Dalai Lama Gets H.U. Fellowship

JERUSALEM — During his recent trip to Israel, the Dalai Lama, spiritual leader of Tibetan Buddhists, was named an honorary fellow of Hebrew University at a ceremony at H.U.'s Givat Ram campus.

The Dalai Lama was recognized for his contribution to world peace through his advocacy of religious and ethnic pluralism.

Present at the ceremony were Hebrew University officials and staff, religious leaders, MKs and members of the Tibet-Israel Friendship Association.

The Dalai Lama was in Israel as a guest of the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel.

Na'amat to Field Candidates

JERUSALEM — Na'amat, established in 1921 as Israel's first women's rights movement, says it intends to field dozens of candidates in future races for Knesset seats and the chairmanship of local authorities.

Ofra Friedman, Na'amat's secretary-general, said the move is intended to get Israeli women the power they deserve.

Friedman is the only women to get the number two slot on any party's list for the Histadrut elections next month.

Na'amat claims 800,000 members in Israel and over 900,000 worldwide.

U.S. Jets to Israel?

WASHINGTON — In a move expected to enhance Israel's defence capability, the Clinton administration announced last week that it hopes to sell up to 25 McDonnell Douglas F-15I fighter planes to Israel.

With the announcement, the administration has voiced its support for a plan announced by Israel last January, when Jerusalem said it would order approximately 20 of the F-15I aircraft at a cost of around $2 billion (U.S.).

Ramon Seeks Histadrut Post

JERUSALEM — Former Health Minister Haim Ramon threw his Labor party into turmoil with his decision last week to run against Labor's incumbent for the post of secretary-general of Histadrut, Israel's largest trade union.

Ramon, 46, is regarded by many as among the Labor Party's best hope for the future.

But with his announcement, Ramon has stirred up internal Labor politics by running against Haim Haberfeld, the incumbent Histadrut boss and the party's choice for another term when elections are held in mid-May.

Ramon's decision is seen as ill-timed since Labor needs also to present a united public front against the onslaught mounted by right-wing opposition to the peace process.

Zhirinovsky At It Again

STRASBOURG — Russian ultranationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky, who manages to raise hackles wherever he travels, did the same last week when he addressed the Council of Europe here.

"We don't want to be Zionized, Islamized or Americanized," Zhirinovsky said.

In a separate incident, Zhirinovsky, leader of Russia's ultra-right Liberal Democratic Party, lost his temper when about 100 Jewish students demonstrated against him in front of the Russian consulate.

Television cameras showed Zhirinovsky grabbing small bushes from the consulate's garden and throwing them at the demonstrators. He reportedly also spat at the protesters and threatened to use a "nuclear pistol" against them.

Meantime, Zhirinovsky has denounced as forgeries documents unearthed by reporters in his home town of Alma Ata which show his surname, until age 18, had been the Jewish-sounding "Edelshtein."

Accused War Criminal Arrives

SYDNEY — Konrad Kalejs, an Australian citizen recently deported from the United States for failing to disclose his wartime activities in Nazi-occupied Latvia, arrived here last week.

The Executive Council of Australian Jewry wrote to the government arguing that "there is a compelling case" to "consider all remedies available" if grounds are found to prosecute Kalejs in this country.

Australian Attorney General Michael Lavarch said the federal police would review the case, which first came before Australian investigators eight years ago.

Kalejs, now 80, immigrated to Australia from Germany after World War II and became a naturalized Australian citizen in the 1950s. He immigrated to the United States in 1959 and omitted any reference to his wartime membership in the Arajs Kommando, a mobile killing unit in Nazi-occupied Latvia.

Efforts to deport Kalejs from the United States began in 1984.

Huge Neo-Nazi Rally

ADELAIDE — This South Australian city, still reeling from a skinhead gang's rampage three weeks ago, was the scene last Sunday of the largest neo-Nazi demonstration in Australia in at least 30 years.

Some 80 to 100 skinheads, bikers and other neo-Nazis, many wearing swastika T-shirts, attended a demonstration sponsored by the neo-Nazi Australian National Action group to protest the possible introduction of anti-racist legislation in Australia.

Israel preparing new proposals on the Golan

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The United States expects Israel to commit to the extent of its withdrawal from the Golan Heights during Secretary of State Warren Christopher's visit here later this month, senior U.S. sources told The Jerusalem Post Sunday.

Syrian President Hafez Assad has already told the United States it would upgrade Israeli-Syrian talks to the foreign minister level, and agree to direct military-to-military talks, if the Christopher mission succeeds, sources told The Post.

"Assad has already said he would be comfortable with a higher level of talks with Israel," one source said. "If the Christopher mission works, these higher-level talks will take place."

Christopher is expected to arrive in Israel April 28.

Under this latest scenario, according to a source, the ongoing Israel-Syria talks in Washington would be relegated to dealing with technical details.

The United States has been promised it would receive an Israeli "package proposal" that Christopher will deliver to Assad.

Detailed blueprint for peace with Syria

The proposal, to be authored by the Israel Defence Force, will deal with extent of withdrawal, nature of peace, security arrangements, and phases of withdrawal. It remains unclear whether Syria will present its own counter-proposals.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin confirmed at Sunday's cabinet meeting that Maj.-Gen. Ilan Biran had prepared a position paper on Israeli security requirements in any Golan withdrawal, and the Foreign Ministry prepared a similar paper on the political aspects of an accord with Syria.

Biran's proposals reportedly include an Israeli willingness to withdraw from the Golan Heights, but without any mention of full withdrawal.

Rabin said the IDF paper did not address full withdrawal. Foreign Ministry officials, however, indicate privately that there is no alternative to full withdrawal, and that the ministry document is based on full withdrawal from the Golan.

The Biran paper is on the package of issues — peace, withdrawal, and security arrangements, — Rabin reportedly told the cabinet.

A recent report in the Israeli daily newspaper Ha'aretz indicated that the foreign ministry was drafting a detailed blueprint for peace with Syria that would be based on a total Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights.

The IDF working paper calls for a withdrawal to be implemented over a period of years, while normalization of relations between the two countries would start after the first stage of withdrawal, when the IDF would still be in control of substantial parts of the Golan.

Peres to meet Arafat in Bucharest

Security arrangements covered in the proposals include the demilitarization of certain areas in the Golan, the scaling down of military forces there, the establishment of early warning stations and the stationing on the Golan of an international force to oversee the implementation of the agreement.

Meanwhile, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres is expected to meet PLO chairman Yasser Arafat at an international economics forum in Bucharest this week.

Israeli officials are also seeking to arrange a meeting in Bucharest between Peres and Jordan's Prime Minister Abdel Salam Majali. Peres is also slated to to meet with Romanian President Ion Iliescu.

Rabin said he would not discuss the components of Israel's proposal with Syria, fearing that any more leaks would undermine Israel's bargaining position. He was furious that reports on the Biran document had appeared in the media.

Meanwhile, talks with the PLO continued on Sunday in Cairo.

"I do not expect we will finish this week, but let us see what happens next week," said Israel's chief negotiator Maj.-Gen. Amnon Shahak, prior to leaving for Egypt.

Among Israel's demands are immunity for its citizens from prosecution in Palestinian courts, as well as protection for Palestinians who have cooperated with Israeli authorities since 1967.

Swiss turned Jews over to Germany, records show

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

GENEVA — According to recently opened archives here, Switzerland was not as hospitable to Jews during World War II as has been widely assumed.

For years, Holocaust researchers in Israel have been seeking access to the Swiss federal archives in Bern, which contain some 46,000 files on Jews who sought refuge in neutral Switzerland during the war years.

But it was not until Swiss Secretary of State Jakob Kellenberger visited Israel in 1993 that Bern agreed to provide limited access to the files. His agreement was a limited gesture, however, since a 50-year embargo on the files' release was about to expire anyway.

Recent research on the files by historians chosen by the Israeli government has shown that Switzerland's record of accepting Jewish asylum-seekers during World War II may be more complicated than has been generally believed.

Israeli researchers, working alongside Swiss officials, have found that some 23,000 Jews were granted asylum in Switzerland during the war. Official Swiss figures show that 10,621 Jews were sent back over the border, but the latest studies indicate that the total was more likely in the range of 20,000 to 30,000.

Preliminary studies also indicate that Jews fleeing into Switzerland were often handed over personally by Swiss military police to the Nazis.

The official explanation was that such steps were taken in an effort to maintain good relations with neighboring Germany.

Poignant file

Many who succeeded in entering Switzerland were later expelled. On Aug. 13, 1942, Swiss Chief of Police Heinrich Rothmund gave the order to send back all non-political refugees over the age of 16 — an order targeted at fleeing Jews.

To date, only 150 files from the massive archive have been thoroughly researched. Information in the files is often fragmentary, and some only refer to a Jew's brief "passage" on Swiss territory before being expelled. Some of the files show refugees having held as many as five identity cards.

The archives, which are considered a treasure trove of information on that period of Swiss history, include identity papers, records of interrogations and reports by the Swiss authorities.

One particularly poignant file tells of a man identified only as Popowski, a Belgian national who crossed the Swiss frontier in July 1942.

"It was terrible," he wrote. "They wanted to send us back. The Germans awaited us at the other side of the Delemont frontier. Women were crying, children screaming — we were about to be handed back when a Swiss customs official was revolted.

"Tears in his eyes, he told officials from Bern: 'If you send back these people and their children, I warn you, I shall kill all of them first and you right after' — and he meant it. We are alive thanks to him."

According to the files, even when Swiss authorities did accept refugees, they demanded that members of the small Jewish community in Switzerland "pay for their brothers."

"The behavior of the (Swiss) federal authorities was far from honorable towards the refugees," said Bernard Lavrie, coordinator of a Swiss-based organization that fights anti-Semitism.

"That is surely why the government took so long to grant access to their archives. The true story of Swiss politics during World War II has yet to be written," he said.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

SZAYMAN

Michael Madesker claims to be a certified Litvak, born in Yerushalaim d'Lita (Vilna). His letter demonstrates that he is a scholar.

He recalls from his childhood days that Szaya (Shaya) was a nickname for Yeshaya (the prophet Isaiah). Right on.

I confirm his conjecture that Szayman derives from that particular nickname. The affectionate Shayke gives rise to the name Shaikin.

Ghetto-era documents found in Warsaw attic

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WARSAW — On the eve of the 51st anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, an extraordinary cache of documents detailing ordinary Jewish life in the wartime ghetto has been made public after lying hidden under the floorboards of an attic for nearly 50 years.

The collection of 180 items — letters, notebooks, photographs, ration cards, books, medicine bottles, food packaging, cigarettes, clothing and other material — was discovered during recent renovation work on the building currently housing the Warsaw offices of the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation and other Jewish organizations.

The Lauder Foundation runs a wide range of Jewish education programs, primarily aimed at young people.

The building, next door to Warsaw's sole surviving shul, the Nozyk Synagogue, served as a Jewish clinic before the war. During the war it was inside the Jewish ghetto.

Discovery of the documents was made on Feb. 28 and following days. Workers doing renovation work found a piece of paper with Hebrew writing on it amid a layer of dirt when they took up the floorboards of the attic.

Rabbi Michael Schudrich, director of the Lauder Foundation in Warsaw, happened to look in to check on the progress of the building work just after the paper came to light and, immediately recognizing its importance, initiated a search for further documents and material.

The documents were hastily examined and catalogued by Lauder Foundation archivist Yale Reisner. Working in collaboration with Warsaw's Jewish Historical Institute, he set up some of them in a temporary exhibition that was unveiled last week for participants in the March of the Living, which includes Canadian students.

The documents are personal papers and memorabilia of the residents of two apartments that also were in the building, the four-member Melchior family and a 20-year-old bachelor, Moses Dov Bursztyn.

Reisner said the cache was probably the most important discovery of ghetto documents since those written as eyewitness accounts and hidden by historian Emmanuel Ringelblum, which were found after the war.

Of the newly discovered material, Reisner said, "What makes this new discovery special is that all the documents and papers are so absolutely ordinary.

"Elja Melchior and his wife Ruchla were both about 36 years old when the ghetto was sealed in 1940," he said.

"Elja was an administrator of the Jewish clinic, and Ruchla ran a little shop that sold vegetables. They had two teen-age children — a daughter, Tauba, who was about 15 and went to a private high school, and a son, Shmuel, who was bar mitzvah in August 1940," he said.

One of the documents in the trove is the first page of Shmuel's bar mitzvah speech — a speech much like those given by bar mitzvah boys today, which includes the phrase that "the Jewish path is not strewn with roses."

The other occupant of the building, Bursztyn, "was a very erudite young man," Reisner said. "He was a member of the Betar Zionist Youth Organization and a graduate of a rabbinical seminary. Among the items we found were some of his books, in three languages, bookplates and a fragment of a book list of his personal library."

One of the papers is a Chanukah speech he wrote in the early days of the war:

"A terrible picture appears before us through the fog of hatred and jealousy directed at us. To one side, there is a homeland awaiting its children, its builders and redeemers, but it is closed tightly before them.

"On the other side stand exiled and tortured Jews with packs on their shoulders standing upon the borders of nations, trying to get out, but there is nowhere for them to go," Bursztyn wrote.

"But the day will surely come when all the evil that surrounds us will fade away like smoke, when Israel's oppressors will be vanquished and a Jewish people, healthy in body and soul, will be a free people in its homeland, the land of Zion and Jerusalem," he wrote.

The exhibit is a moving evocation of the life of a typical middle-class Jewish family as the madness of Hitler's Nazis closed in.

Elja was inside the ghetto when it was sealed, but his wife was out of town. The daughter, Tauba, appears to have smuggled herself — and goods — in and out of the ghetto.

"I could write a lot about our lives, but I don't want to set off my nerves, and my heart and willpower are too weak at this moment to get into it," Elja wrote to his wife in a letter that was part of the trove. In the letter he mixed Yiddish and Polish in an apparent attempt to dodge the censors.

Other items include Tauba's schoolbooks and notebooks — including her doodles — as well as her class autograph book, full of sentimental verse, and Shmuel's report card, in Polish and Hebrew. His grades were all simply marked "adequate."

Yellow ration cards were found, as well as food wrappers. There were also keepsakes, like prewar wedding invitations.

"It was very exciting for the young Polish Jews here," Reisner said of the discovery. "They began to see the continuity."

He said it wasn't known how the documents ended up in the attic, but that it's likely the gentiles who moved into the apartments after the war simply used whatever they found in the building as insulation.

The latest dated document was a 1946 bill for repairs to the apartments.

Forged letters threaten to deport Nuremberg Jews

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NUREMBERG — The Jewish community in this Bavarian city has reacted furiously to forged letters informing Jews of their forthcoming deportation, a chilling hearkening back to the Holocaust.

The official-looking letter appeared on the stationery of the Federal Office for the Recognition of Asylum Seekers.

The letter stated that according to a certain "deportation law," the recipient had to appear at a train station within a week if the person could not prove by then his or her "Aryan origin."

So far, 13 citizens of Nuremberg, the German city where the postwar trials of Nazis were held, have reported receiving the malicious letters, according to German police.

All the letters were mailed in Nuremberg on April 10, and Israelis living there were among the recipients.

Both the letterhead and the name signed at the end of the letter were apparently forged.

German police are investigating, but no arrests have been made. They are offering the equivalent of a $3,000 (U.S.) reward to anyone who can provide information that will lead to arrests in the case.

The chairman of the Nuremberg Jewish community, Arno Hamburger, sought to calm nerves, saying the letter was a forgery and the community's 400 members have nothing to fear.

But Hamburger, 71, described the letters as a particularly heinous form of anti-Semitic material, "because in their style" they are "reminiscent of the Nazi era."

A government official in Bavaria described the letters as "infamous." He said that the perpetrators trample on "Germany's reputation."

JNF

EARTH WEEK 1994
(APRIL 22 - 29)

Trees are important - to the air we breathe and the water we drink, to the soil, enhancing the beauty of our landscapes and ensuring the quality of our lives. During EARTH WEEK, we have the opportunity to re-dedicate ourselves to protecting the environment of this planet we all share by purchasing and planting trees.

JNF will mark EARTH WEEK in a very special way. Our University Student Division will plant a tree right here in Toronto to match each tree purchased for planting in Israel. They are organizing a special tree planting in Metro on May 1, in co-operation with The Evergreen Foundation.

Rabbinical Reflections

By RABBI AARON LEVINE

In this week's sidrah (Kedoshim) we read: "Each man shall fear his mother and father . . ." This command complements the fifth commandment, where the word honor is used. It is impossible to summarize all the practical halachot of these commandments in this article but we'll tackle some of them in the form of 10 commandments for children and 10 for parents.

Many times we have to agonize a little over our children's upbringing, but if we do it early on, we'll avoid worse agony later. The story is told that some men, posing as mourners at a mock funeral, were once smuggling contraband over the border in a coffin. Everything was going smoothly until one alert guard noticed that no one was crying. "Strange," he thought, "a funeral with no tears." So he ordered the coffin opened, and discovered the contraband. The mock mourners all began to cry. Said the guard, "if you had cried earlier, you wouldn't have to cry now."

Remember also that if we train our children and ourselves in these laws, we are offering the greatest gift of all — life itself, as promised in the Torah.

1. Thou shall obey thy parents' request the first time it is expressed (as long as it does not contravene one of HaShem's commands). 2. Thou shall attend to thy parents' needs in a pleasant and willing manner (bring them food, drink, clothing, other requested items) — at the same time thou shall be appreciative of all that your parents do for you. 3. Thou shall rise when parents enter the room (at least once a day). 4. Thou shall greet thy parents — good morning, afternoon, evening. 5. Thou shall study Torah and do good deeds. 6. Thou shall not contradict thy parents. (Thou may respectfully explain or question). 7. Thou shall never insult (or raise thy voice), embarrass, or distress thy parents — (thou shall always talk with respect and courtesy). 8. Thou shall not sit in thy parents' seat. 9. Thou shall not call thy parents by their first name. 10. Thou shall not wake up thy parents (unless you know that not waking them would distress them — or unless it is for a mitzvah).

For parents: 1. Thou shall teach thy children and enforce the laws of honoring and respecting parents. 2. Nevertheless, thou shall be sensitive to the honor, dignity, and hurt of your children. 3. Therefore thou shall not strike any child who you would cause to transgress the laws of respect if he would react by insulting you — (almost all children). 4. Thou shall not be overdemanding or overbearing. 5. Thou shall not reprimand sternly when a gentle reprimand would suffice. 6. Thou shall not be unforgiving when a child disobeys his obligations toward you — rather thou shall be forbearing and forgiving (sometimes depending on the circumstances, the nature of the offense, and the sincerity of the apology). 7. Thou shall avoid, wherever possible, attacking the personality of the child — but rather describe the offense that has been committed. 8. Rather than reacting angrily in a non-thought-out and inappropriate manner, thou shall defer punishment until thou can react in a calm, collected and reasonable manner. 9. Thou shall, in many (most) cases, allow thy child to present an explanation for his misbehavior before meting out punishment. 10. Thou shall as parents act in a manner which will bring honor to your children rather than dishonor (set a good example).

I end with a quote from Kitzur Shulchan Aruch (143:21):

"One who wishes to sincerely honor his mother and father should involve himself with Torah study and mitzvah observance. This is the greatest honor to parents, for people will then say, 'happy is the father and mother who raised such a child.' But if the child does not go in the right path, his parents will suffer shame and he will embarrass them in a manner which can bring no greater embarrassment. Similarly a parent who sincerely wishes to honor his children, should involve himself in Torah study and good deeds and should act pleasingly in the eyes of God and man. His children will thus be honored through him. But one who does not follow the right path; his children, too, will be despised through him. Also, through the sins of parents, children sometimes die, as it is written, "He visits the sins of parents on children." There is no greater cruelty than this, that through his sins he causes the death of his children. And there is no one more merciful on his children than the righteous whose merit lasts for a thousand generations."

Good Shabbos!

Problems at home accompany hopes of peacemaking

By YESHAYAHU ANUG

As Israel enters its 47th year and external attention focuses on the slow-moving peace process, the internal agenda presents other challenges. Still, the most crucial question is whether this society and its political leadership are strong and self-confident enough to sustain the high costs of an imperfect settlement with the Arabs, or whether the present window of opportunity will again be closed for an indefinite period of maybe even greater risks. Meanwhile other issues on the internal agenda keep the government just as busy as the peace process and its problems.

The commission of inquiry into the Hebron massacre will in the end offer a reliable report on how the unprecedented massacre in the mosque could happen. It is beyond its scope to tell how the continued presence of the tiny group of Jewish fanatics in that most hostile Arab town can be assured. That will remain the inescapable task of the government, unless it decides to evacuate the group from the inner city.

The appearance on the scene of United Nations observers (at the request of the PLO) can only add new hazards to the already impossible co-habitation.

Then there is the uncertain future of the Jewish settlements in the rest of the territories. This explosive problem cannot be solved by clever rhetoric, but must be confronted politically and financially. It won't go away if left to the care of destiny alone.

A comprehensive solution must be found for the labor market in Israel, from which, for security reasons, Arab workers are now excluded. They are to be replaced for the time being by a much smaller number of imported foreign workers who will be employed in the building industry and in agriculture. However, this emergency measure offers no alternative means of subsistence to the many tens of thousands Arab workers, the providers for their families in the territories. A grave economic crisis in the closed territories could easily generate a more vicious wave of terrorism than the one the harsh measures are attempting to stem.

Yeshayahu Anug

The closure of greenline Israel to Arabs from the territories affects not just the breadwinners, but also thousands of ordinary people who can now not enter East Jerusalem, the site of the principal Arab hospitals, schools and other institutions used daily by the population of the adjacent part of the West Bank. No solution for them has so far been offered.

In May, the political scene could be shaken and Labor damaged by the outcome of the Histadrut (Confederation of Trade Unions) elections, as its current secretary — and Labor candidate — is being challenged by the former minister of health, Chaim Ramon. Ramon wants to reform health care and free its beneficiaries from obligatory membership in the Histadrut. His reformist plans are opposed by the mighty Labor apparatus of that institution. A very popular young politician, Ramon seems to count on substantial public support, but only the Histadrut voters will decide whether his daring step will make or break him. Ramon wants to remain in the Labor party and if his opponents do not succeed in expelling him, he could — if victorious — even help his party in these important elections.

In the economic-financial sector, where relative prosperity and growth co-exist with falling stocks and high interest rates, a number of once omnipotent bankers accused of having (in 1983) allowed stock prices to rise well beyond their reasonable levels, causing their collapse and enormous losses to the confident public and to the Treasury, have now been sentenced to prison terms. They will appeal, but history was made by a district judge against a formerly untouchable species.

The list of unusual issues would not be complete without mentioning the bizarre case of the General Commissioner of Police, who, after barely a year in office, resigned because he had accepted relatively small favors from the owners of recreation facilities in Eilat and Tiberias. Small fry compared to the great corruption scandals which cover the front pages of the world press almost everywhere, yet another example that house cleaning is under way.

And finally, there is the peace process.

Last September, when the accord with the PLO was signed, the mood was a mixture of hope and suspicion, both inflated, but optimism prevailed. Now that implementation — several times postponed — is about to occur in Gaza and in Jericho, with an international presence in Hebron as an unforeseen bonus for the Palestinians, the air is filled with question marks. Arab revenge for the Hebron massacre is predictably taking its toll, the government's reaction reflects short-term improvisation and the public is getting disenchanted. Many partisans of "peace by compromise" now doubt the government's resolve and ability to act decisively, and the various opponents of any settlement describe the official policies as tantamount to national betrayal. That opposition, though divided, ranges from the uninspiring Likud to the militant settlers with their potentially terrorist fringes and is assisted in the wings by a number of politically mobilized rabbis.

In the Palestinian community, where the Oslo agreement was initially seen as a magic prescription for rapid change and elicited too many unrealistic expectations, disappointment set in soon, when little happened on the ground to keep the expectations alive. And the PLO leadership is not even in the area to prove its authority and influence in the Palestinian community. The leaders are still in Tunis and probably not too eager to return.

Both negotiating partners appear to be insecure and inhibited and are dragging their feet. The opponents of the peace process on both sides seem to dominate the streets with noisy demonstrations and stickers on their cars. The one uses the massacre in Hebron and the other the latest wave of Hamas terror to blame the ongoing negotiations between Israel and the PLO for the bloodshed, and both groups demand — in almost identical terms — to stop the peacemaking altogether. But they have no alternatives to offer.

This is why, if for no other reason, the peace process stands a chance of materializing after all.

Israel just beginning to take women seriously

By ANAT HOFFMAN

Israeli Commandos Train was the subtitle of your front page photograph (Dec. 2, 1993. It caught my eye, because the images in the photograph and subtitle, Female members of an IDF Commando unit undergo vigorous training, seem as if they were taken from my fantasy about what the IDF should and could be as well as your wishful thinking about the modern Israeli woman.

In reality, I have no idea where and when this photograph was taken. Since there are NO WOMEN COMMANDOS in the Israeli army and women are not trained for any combat activity, your guess is as good as mine as to who those uniformed women are.

Although women are subject to compulsory service in the army, they spend only 18 months in uniform (while men serve over 3 years). Women can apply to only 124 army professions (all non-combat) while over 500 are available. Most Israeli women soldiers are army clerks; they type, file, and make tea for their male commanders.

I know that many Jews abroad would like to think that Israeli Jews, and in particular Israeli women, are "new Jews" — breaking old molds to create a strong, healthy and courageous new breed. Events such as the Gulf War and the Entebbe Raid ignite the imagination and fuel belief in the Israeli as a "new Jew." I share this aspiration with Diaspora Jews. I too, long to see Israel as an incubator for normal healthy Jews, free of "baggage" and paranoia where a person with vision, courage and just the right measure of chutzpah can flourish.

However, being a native product of Israeli upbringing, I have learned that this new Jew stereotype has been superficially modeled after Paul Newman's character Ari Ben Canaan in Exodus. Today's reality in Israel illustrates how we are a complex Jewish community. We struggle with the challenges of our climate, neighbors, local bullies and yes, our "baggage" which we carried from our countries of origin.

One of the prominent signs of unfairness in modern Israeli society, rooted in our ancient customs, is the status of women. Women make up only 9.2 per cent of our Knesset (Parliament), earn 30-50 per cent less than men with comparable jobs and cannot initiate divorce from their husbands. At the Western Wall in Jerusalem, a holy site to all Jews, women are restricted from prayer while wearing tallit (prayer shawl), reading from a Sefer Torah and singing. Furthermore, in January 1994, the Rabbi of the Wall announced that women soldiers will henceforth no longer be allowed to sing the national anthem Hatikvah at the Western Wall during induction ceremonies. The Israel Defence Forces agreed.

IDF women commandos... fact or fiction?

Nevertheless, in some other matters Israel is just now beginning to take women seriously. The delay has not been due to a lack of serious women or awareness of major discrimination. Rather, it appears that the onset of peace has opened the way for social issues to take their proper place on Israel's public agenda. These issues, including women's issues, were always set aside from "burning security concerns." So NOW is the time for Diaspora Jews, especially those in Western democracies, to help shape the character of Israeli society. We are in desperate need of Jewish feminists (male and female).

I believe that a photograph of the Women of the Wall being jeered at by ultra-Orthodox men at the Western Wall, or of proudly dressed female soldiers unable to sing their country's national anthem (Hope for the future generations) are truer images of Jewish women in Israel today than your women "commandos" article; one may observe how the expressions of the Women of the Wall reveal conviction and determination, how the soldiers seem ironically placed in commando fantasy. These are the faces of the "new Jews" at the forefront of Israeli society.

Anat Hoffman is on the Jerusalem City Council and is a regular participant in the Women of the Wall group. (The author wishes to thank Julie Blane of WUJS for help in preparing this article.)

Revival of Jewish culture in Berlin

By MIRIAM WIDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Almost 50 years after Adolf Hitler nearly wiped out Germany's Jewish community, there's been a spurt of growth of things Jewish in Berlin, with openings of everything from kosher restaurants to a Jewish art gallery.

A revival of Jewish culture is taking place in this city's old Jewish neighborhood, the Scheunenviertel.

So extensive is the activity that, in a city where the only thing the average citizen knows about Jews is that they were victims of the Holocaust, Jewish places are very much in fashion in some quarters.

"You could say it's sort of chic," said Nikolai Sluzki, an artist born in St. Petersburg, Russia, who operates the Jewish art gallery.

"There's a certain part of the intelligentsia that always wants to try something new," he observed.

Sluzki's gallery features artists from the former Soviet Union, and his visitors are a mixture of Jewish and non-Jewish Germans and tourists.

The tourists come mostly from Canada, the United States and Australia.

Sluzki's gallery is on the Oranienburger Strasse, a main street in the city's Jewish neighborhood and home to the spectacular dome-topped synagogue that once was the crowning glory of the Berlin Jewish community. The synagogue is now being renovated.

Next to the synagogue is Cafe Oren, an Israeli-style cafe operated by Joachannan Bergel, a 44-year-old machine engineer who became a wildly successful restaurateur with the cafe's opening 18 months ago.

Jews and non-Jews and quite a few tourists gather here to munch on falafel and humus and drink Israeli wine.

Bergel has been in Berlin for more than 20 years, and as he says, he "just got stuck here" after his application to the city's renowned film school was rejected.

He started the cafe at the suggestion of Heinz Galinski, the deceased former leader of the German and Berlin Jewish communities.

Around the corner is the equally good but much more sedate Beth Cafe, run by the Jewish community of the former East Germany.

The cafe serves bagels. It is reportedly the only place in the city where you can find American-Jewish culinary treats.

Just off the same street is a kosher food store, where homesick North Americans can buy Empire chickens and Manischewitz gefilte fish.

Added to the places where you can fill your stomach with goodies that answer to a higher authority are the numerous places to feast on Jewish history and religion.

Adult education is offered in both the eastern and western parts of town, with materials available at a very good Jewish bookstore near the famous Kurfurstendamm shopping street.

The city supports a Jewish elementary school and a recently opened high school, and has at least a half-dozen synagogues.

This is in a city where only about 10,000 of the town's nearly 4 million residents are Jewish and where most people do not have the foggiest notion of what it means to be a Jew.

At the opening of the Jewish adult education classes in eastern Berlin, Peter Gay, a Yale University professor who was born here and forced to leave in 1939, said, "If you're pessimistic, you can view the opening (of this school) as a Band-Aid that won't stick.

"Lots of people are conscious of the concentration camps and they know about German anti-Semitism. And many know about famous German Jews, like Einstein. But few Germans are conscious of how Jews lived — they only know them as victims," said Gay, a biographer of Sigmund Freud.

Yet despite the packed lectures, restaurants and classes, leaders of the Jewish community here emphasize that their efforts to build the community are not made for tourists or the few well-minded gentile Germans.

Roman Skoblo, a member of the board of the Berlin Jewish community, said Jewish leaders here are primarily trying to bring things Jewish back to the Jews.

They also have the goal of teaching the some 6,000 immigrants from the former Soviet Union what it is to be Jewish.

"We have a lot of work to do to make Jews Jews," Skoblo said.

The community is not only working with the former Soviet Jews, but it is also trying to make Jewish life more attractive for the estimated several thousand Jews in Berlin who are not registered with the Jewish community.

It also wants to get those who are registered to be more involved.

To the outside world, Germany's Jewish leaders would like to have their pariah status removed. Long criticized for living in the land that nearly destroyed them, Germany's Jews are often on the defensive.

While kosher restaurants and Jewish art galleries bring a sense of normality to the community, acceptance takes some time.

"Maybe we'll be successful with the next generation or the generation after that," Skoblo said.

New reality

South Africa is bracing for the most politically-charged and historically momentous general election in its history.

By having enfranchised all South Africans, not just whites, the white-minority South African government, led by President F.W. de Klerk, has rejected apartheid and set the stage for the country's first multiracial election next week.

And since blacks vastly outnumber whites, there is a strong probability that Nelson Mandela — the leader of the African National Congress — will be elected as South Africa's first black president.

The prospect of imminent black majority rule has ruffled many whites in South Africa, but it need not be so. Apartheid was an evil and economically inefficient system that was historically doomed. Now, on the cusp of a new era in South African politics, the white community would do well to accustom itself to this looming reality. To be sure, there are holdouts, whites and blacks, but their rejectionist position has been roundly repudiated by the majority of South Africans, weary of the morally bankrupt policies of the past.

The Jewish community is, as one observer aptly put it, "holding its breath." In common with all whites, Jews wonder whether the post-apartheid government will be able to contain the escalating ethnic violence which has convulsed South Africa since 1984; whether the wave of street crime can be reined in; whether the white community will be the target of a demoralizing redistribution of wealth; whether Jewish institutions and private schools will continue to be partially funded by state subsidies; whether foreign exchange regulations will enable Jews to send charity and investment funds to Israel; and whether South Africa's heretofore close relationship with Israel will remain intact.

Obviously, there will be changes, some fundamental and wrenching, as South Africa trades in apartheid for mass democracy. But one hopes that the powers-that-be will act wisely and with restraint as South Africa leaves its unsavory legacy of apartheid behind.

Justice for Pollard

U.S. President Bill Clinton disappointed many people recently when he decided not to grant Jonathan Pollard clemency. Citing national security reasons and the alleged gravity of Pollard's spying activities, Clinton indicated that his decision represented the recommendations of U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno and "the unanimous views of the law enforcement and national security agencies."

What is especially disquieting in the Clinton statement on Pollard is the side-stepping refusal of the president to confront the real issue. Neither Pollard nor his supporters have ever denied that he is guilty of passing classified information to Israel. The issue is not his guilt but the life sentence that was meted out to him under circumstances which cry out for explanation.

Those circumstances include: allegations that Pollard was promised leniency when he agreed to forego a trial; the bizarre and vindictive role of a former American defence secretary and the disproportionate sentence handed Pollard compared to comparatively light sentences given to other convicted spies in recent years, even to those who spied for enemies of the United States. It should not be lost on the president that Pollard gave classified information to an American ally.

How was it possible for Clinton to ignore these factors in reaffirming Pollard's sentence?

The answer probably lies in the U.S. president's shaky political position in view of the Whitewater probe into his and his wife's financial activities more than a decade ago. The recent arrest of CIA agent Aldrich Ames on charges he spied for Russia has also complicated the situation by making it more difficult for Clinton to display flexibility in the Pollard affair.

These factors and a mounting wave of criticism of the president's inability to move the country on health and economic issues has induced a timidity on his part. Refusing clemency for Pollard was an easy out for the American president.

Bill Clinton is no Pharaoh and his heart, far from being hardened, is still susceptible to a change for the better. That change will be effected, however, only if the vast coalition of Pollard supporters — Jews and gentiles — continue to pressure the White House unceasingly with appeals to the moral conscience of the American government.

The gauntlet has been picked up by, among others, Elaine Zeitz, the Toronto-based spokesperson for Citizens for Justice for Jonathan Pollard and Pollard's fiancee. Zeitz, no shrinking violet, has pledged that the battle for her betrothed has only just begun.

Righteous protests of this sort have been found to work. They can bring Jonathan Pollard out of his captivity.

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures.

A SMEAR ON U.S. JUSTICE

Bert Raphael, Jonathan Pollard's Canadian counsel, has written the following letter to President Clinton.

Your recent decision not to pardon Jonathan Pollard is both disappointing and with all due respect, a continuing violation of his constitutional rights. That your Attorney General and you as a lawyer could fail to see the injustice of his sentence defies logic. You were both trained in legal systems that honor and respect precedent. My approach to you in previous correspondence has not been on the basis of compassion or sympathy but as lawyer to lawyer, based on long and sound established legal principles. Your refusal to adhere to the rule of law and to fail to recognize an ongoing injustice is both disappointing and frightening. You and your administration will perpetuate this dark smear on American jurisprudence initiated by your predecessors.

SUPPORT SAME SEX BILL

We are writing this open letter to the Ontario Jewish community, both individuals and organizations, to urge you to support the same sex legislation that we hope will soon be introduced by the provincial government. This legislation would amend all statutes that discriminate against lesbians and gays. This is not a gay versus straight issue. Rather, it is an issue of human rights for all.

We urge all Jews of good conscience to let the government know that our tradition insists that we deal justly and compassionately with all individuals. Until now our discriminatory civil laws have failed to respect the equal rights of all.

As Jews, it is our obligation to take a stand now in support of this legislation that will begin to right this grievous wrong. As well, we must make a strong statement of support to the lesbian and gay members of our Jewish community.

These issues have gone unaddressed for far too long.

DISPUTE CJC ON REFORM PARTY

The Jewish Feminist Anti-Fascist League (JFAFL) was deeply troubled to read Canadian Jewish Congress President Irving Abella's description of Preston Manning as a "very impressive man [whose] heart is in the right place" in The Canadian Jewish News (May 31). We believe that the CJC should be deeply suspicious of Manning, and his promise to inform the CJC of any "[racist or anti-Semitic] troublemakers" in his party.

The CJC's legitimation of Manning's politically expedient comments is problematic. Indeed, should we not be asking why racists and anti-Semites are attracted to the Reform Party in the first place?

Does Congress truly believe that after one meeting Manning has "realized" that his party's position on immigration might actually generate racism? If so, mazel tov is in order, for in a few hours the CJC has achieved what anti-racist activists have been unable to do in a few years. Ultimately, the CJC is profoundly mistaken to assume that Jews, or any other vulnerable Canadian community, will be served by the trust that was reflected in these comments. When formulating a position on immigration, history ought to be remembered: it was not long ago that massive populations of Jewish immigrants were denied entry into Canada for many of the same views espoused by Preston Manning and his Party.

Because it is crucial that when representing the Jewish community the CJC acknowlege the community's diversity of opinion, we would like to take this opportunity to make Congress aware of our position on this and other issues.

WHAT DANES DID

Re — Rabbi Joseph Kelman's column in which he wrote: "Schindler's List reminds the entire world that it did not care and did nothing to help, etc." (CJN April 7)

My purpose in writing is not to outrage or get into dialogue with anybody, but all future attempts to eliminate G-d's great light that shone into Denmark and Sweden in 1943 can no longer be ignored by people who by now, 50 years later, still insist on not knowing what the blessed and heroic Danes did for their 7,200 Jews, (I among them).

If he (and others) do not know, my suggestion is: on their next trip to Israel, stop over in wonderful Copenhagen and find out.

OBJECT TO HEADLINE

We are shocked by the headline "Jews are blamed for firebombing at German shul" (CJN, April 7).

The headline completely misleads the reader and misrepresents the article which follows.

Firstly, the headline's wording is ambiguous and at first glance, seems to declare that Jews perpetrated the bombing.

Secondly, according to the contents of the article, it is not Jews that are blamed but only one Jew, Ignatz Bubis.

Thirdly, not mentioning the source of the statement in the headline (ultra right, former SS, etc.) legitimized the source's claim.

Finally, we are dismayed by the suspension of accuracy in favor of sensationalism. We did not expect to see this in The CJN and we do not accept it.

LOSING BY DEFAULT

Re: Mara Koven's Article on Defence Against Missionaries (Feb. 24).

I applaud every article on this subject. Five years ago I also wrote to The CJN in reference to an article by Ancil Kashetsky on the same subject. But both articles failed to mention one of the most powerful and vital tools available to Jews to combat the evils of missionary activity: Gerald Sigel's superb book, The Jew and the Christian Missionary: A Jewish Response to Missionary Christianity.

The book was published in New York by Ktav in 1981. Every Jewish home and synagogue library should own this book! All people who are serious about Judaism and Jewishness should use this vital work as a text for workshops, orientation sessions, and adult education.

It is appalling that we do so little to defend ourselves! There is great danger that by default we allow strangers to take over our Holy Scriptures and misinterpret them to our detriment. Sigel's book is a first line of defence.

Something happened on the way from the airport

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

As readers of this column know, I have done a fair amount of travelling. Usually, when the trip is not too long, I take my car to the airport, leave it with Park 'n Fly, then take the bus to the terminal and off I go.

Recently, on a Sunday afternoon, when I returned to Toronto I followed my routine. The bus which picks up Park 'n Fly customers from the airport came and I seated myself near the entrance. So far so good.

At the next terminal the bus became crowded. A large group of rather young people (they turned out to be members of a wrestling team) piled in with lots of suitcases. At the last moment one more young man stormed in, swinging in his hand a fairly large valise, and stumbled into the aisle. In the process, his suitcase hit me squarely in the knee.

Here is where the story begins.

Having had some problems with my knees in the past (due to sports injuries) my body registered an instant cry of pain and discomfort — loud enough so that passengers in the bus were forced to pay attention. The driver was immediately solicitous and asked me whether I was hurt. I told him that I did not know as yet, but hoped that it would be nothing.

However, the young man who had said a perfunctory "excuse me" was no longer interested in my discomfort, and that bothered me a good deal. I asked him what his name was. He refused to give it to me. I explained patiently that I might need it for insurance purposes just in case I was hurt. He gave me a thoroughly unpleasant answer.

Rabbi Plaut

The bus driver, however, radioed ahead for the supervisor to meet us, and it was at this point that the young man realized that maybe it would be better if he complied with my request. He gave me his name, and excused himself again. I assured him that I knew that what he had done was totally unintentional, but just to protect myself it might be necessary to have the information I had requested.

Meanwhile, the bus was on its way, and my pain was no longer as excruciating as it had been before. Perhaps it had been the shock more than anything else.

People opposite me were engaged in pleasant conversation. Not one of them asked how I was, which moved me to ask in turn whether I could use them as witnesses if I would need them. They immediately responded as if with one voice, "We have seen nothing."

Suddenly the entire situation acquired a different focus for me. The physical hurt I had suffered was minor, but I became deeply concerned over what I now perceived to be the real problem: the total unwillingness of other passengers to assist me in whatever minor way might be necessary. They stuck their heads into the proverbial sand and pretended to know nothing at all.

When we arrived at the Park 'n Fly terminal the supervisor was there, concerned and helpful, and it turned out I was all right an hour later. I no longer remember what the pain was like; it is marvellous how one can forget physical ailments.

But what remained with me was the reaction of the passengers. The Bible reminds us (in Leviticus 19) that we should not stand by when someone is in danger. The rabbis widened this concept considerably and said that one should go beyond the letter of the law and testify in court when required to do so. The people in the bus apparently had not read the Bible or in any case were unwilling to follow its unread dictates. I could not help but remember other cases — especially a famous one in New York when people in an apartment complex looked out of their windows and watched a serious crime being committed without doing anything about it. (One of the crowd finally phoned the police, but the rest later pretended not to have seen anything.)

The whole experience was a reminder of the breakdown in our sense of community. We appeared to sit together in the bus, yet we were part of nothing — individuals pressed together by accident, no one responsible for anyone else. The major sentiment was: "Don't count on me, I don't want to get involved. I don't care whether you need me or not. I am looking out for number one."

I still feel hurt all right, but not in my knee.

Weizman makes presidency into Israeli institution

By DANIELLA ASHKENAZY

There is a stark difference between the cool, English temper — the reserve, formality and dignity of the monarchy — and the demeanor of a ceremonial leader for a Mediterranean people hanging by a thread at the edge of the Third World.

For Israel — typified by spontaneity, informality and lack of reserve — the inauguration of the nation's seventh president, Ezer Weizman, has finally made the presidency into a genuinely Israeli institution, not merely an "import item" from European democracies.

Nearly void of actual powers, the Israeli presidency is an institution that relies heavily on style. Weizman, who took office a year ago May, is endowing the office with a special flavor that reflects his Sabra upbringing. One member of his staff described Weizman as ibn el-balad (Arabic for native son), a title Yediot Achronot staff reporter Gabi Brun who has covered the presidency for 16 years, described as "the essence of the change."

Israel's fifth president, Yitzhak Navon, was also a Sabra — "warm and earthy but more in the style of 'a benevolent effendi'," noted one observer. Weizman seems to mirror more faithfully the typical Israeli — familial and unceremonious, candid and direct, spontaneous and hyperactive — but in a particularly "Weizman way."

Beginning a series of presidential visits with a tour of Yerocham, a development town south of Beersheva, the 69-year-old president joshed with a 67-year-old citizen that "he was still only a kid" and kidded with a group of children in a karate lesson: "Gimmie a look of murder in your eyes."

Brun subsequently described the new presidency as "open-collar, spirited, direct and abrasive."

While the office of the president leaves little room for substantive change, Weizman seems to have some surprises in store, including expanding the locations honored by presidential visits. Together with environment minister Yossi Sarid, he inspected Tel Aviv's Harivah garbage dump in a joint effort to raise public awareness of the need for recycling.

Even in rigidly structured visits, Weizman remains his own man. During a trip to Ramlah prison, the president — one of whose few real powers is in granting pardons — walked past the cell of the kidnapper-murderer of an Israeli child without shaking the inmate's hand. Weizman spoke informally with other inmates.

Weizman reaches out by participating, not observing. Other presidents certainly have addressed the nation in times of crisis. But while Kiriyat Shmona was under Katyusha rocket fire in last summer's Operation Accountability campaign, Weizman spent the night there sleeping in a bunker with IDF soldiers.

And when Weizman visited the IDF Southern Command, he donned a pair of ear plugs for a bit of target practice, beaming with pride at his scores.

Less the figurehead and more flesh-and-blood persona, Weizman draws on a wellspring of personal experience to connect with people.

While there have been no opinion polls on the "Weizman style," shop clerks, moshavniks, journalists and office executives say his uimposing manner is a welcome change from his predecessors.

When a jittery Elton John fled Israel within hours of his arrival — offended by being asked to present his passport in person and spooked by several aggressive news photographers — a number of Knesset members pleaded with the pop star to return (which he did, giving a splendid concert). But Weizman dryly commented that Israel would manage to survive without him.

Daniel Elazar, head of the Jerusalem Centre for Public Affairs, has followed the presidency for 30 years. He said Israel's first president, Chaim Weizmann — Ezer Weizman's uncle — was ill for most of his presidency and played a passive role, adding little more than prestige to the office.

Yitzhak Ben-Zvi had been a Socialist pioneer in his early years, but his status as a poet and historian gave the presidency an aura of scholarship.

Zalman Shazar came to the presidency from the political arena, but his chassidic roots led the third president to introduce a minyan to the presidential residence.

Ephriam Katzir served only one five-year term as president, emphasizing education and the importance of scientific endeavors, but clearly regretting being taken away from his scientific research.

Yitzhak Navon was the first president to expand the scope of the office by taking a public stand on moral issues, and his two terms are associated closely with raising the status of Sephardi Jewry.

Chaim Herzog, a former ambassador as well as a former general, used his gentlemanly-style to emboss the presidency with a sense of grandness, deepening ties with world Jewry and enhancing Israel's international relations.

Weizman has announced he sees his role in bringing the majority of the Jewish people to live in the Jewish state through advancing peace, absorbing immigrants and economic growth.

Nevertheless, Weizman's public image and past history is filled with mischief, surprise moves and slips of the tongue. Something of a local enfant terrible, Weizman once took a "short cut" in Haifa, driving his car down a flight of steps on the Carmel.

Which was the bagel and which was the lox?

By JACK CHISVIN

One of the lesser virtues of locating an office in the suburbs is a lack of facilities to procure a good lunch. As a result many of our staff are brown-baggers. I use the term generically for the hot, sticky, running, gooey stuff displayed at lunchtime is hardly the contents for a brown bag.

The lunchroom tables are spread out with an array of foil and plastic containers offering the best Italian, Greek, Indian, Jamaican, Chinese, Japanese and Polish home-cooking to be found anywhere. The smells are spicy, sweet and pungent and the presentation fabulous, although I, who have seen food served in the strangest way around the world, can't always recognize the dishes. Which brings me to the subject of ethnic food.

My good friend, prominent lawyer and raconteur Bob Hall told me this story. It seems he had a meeting in his office with a client from overseas who had to catch an early flight home. As time was getting short it was suggested lunch be sent up from the neighborhood delicatessen. "You can have a knishe, kishka, kugel or a knaidel — all kosher, but if you favor something with less kolesterol — oops, cholesterol, I recommend a bagel and lox," said Bob.

"Bagel and lox would be fine," the client replied.

Lunch soon arrived and was heartily consumed. "That was delicious," said the client. "But tell me Mr. Hall, which was the bagel and which was the lox?"

Bob's client notwithstanding, most people would recognize a bagel by sight. What a croissant is to French food, and a crumpet is to English food, a bagel is to Jewish food. Bagels are also connected with the kind of Jewish jokes that defy logic. Inquiries into the origin of the bagel generally run something like this. "Why is it called a bagel?" "Because it has a hole in the middle." "Why does it have a hole in the middle?" "Because without a hole it wouldn't be a bagel."

A Toronto daily newspaper recently devoted an entire page to the bagel. Amongst other facts, the article traces the origin of the bagel to Vienna in the year 1683. A more authoritarian source on the history of the bagel is an El Al pamphlet distributed along with the traditional breakfast of bagels and lox. As I remember it, the pamphlet described two versions of the origin of the bagel.

On had an archeologist excavating a tel in the Galilee uncovering a petrified legab, a staple food of an ancient biblical tribe. The archeologist, who normally read from left to right, didn't realize that the people of the legab were Semites, who wrote right to left. Consequently he spelled legab backwards and left us the bagel.

Another version was postulated by a historian who studied life on the island of Crete in the days before the common era. A Jewish baker named Bagelus suffered from gout, and in accordance with the remedy of his time, encased his toes in warm dough for relief. One day, during a treatment, he fell asleep while sitting in the sun and when he woke from his nap he found the toe-rings baked brown and shiny. History does not record whether Bagelus continued to make toe-ring rolls by foot or whether he was astute enough to put them in an oven and thus start the bagel baking business.

Jack Chisvin

An advertisement for a bagel baking franchise states over 13 million bagels are consumed daily in North America, worth over a billion dollars a year. Big business indeed, and nonsectarian.

Even if we accept the Bagelus toe-ring theory, today the best bagels are shaped by hand. Most bagels are sold on Sundays and have come to give purpose to a salmon's life.

A salmon fulfils its destiny not when it swims upstream to spawn, but when it is finally smoked, sliced, and put to rest on a bed of cream cheese. Some people contend the best lox comes from Scottish salmon, others from Norwegian salmon, still others from Pacific salmon, but most would agree the best lox comes from Atlantic salmon. The El Al pamphlet informs us its pilots dip the aircraft's wing in appreciation and respect everytine they fly over the Atlantic provinces.

Bagel eating is a highly personal thing and has evolved an etiquette of its own. Breaking a bagel as you might do with a piece of bread or slicing it in segments is acceptable but not very accommodating for cream cheese and lox. The true way to slice a bagel is to create two symmetrical rings. In so doing, the show-off holds a bagel in one hand and slices down. The more cautious slice from the bottom up. The timid use a plastic holder.

The keen observer will note that bagels are at the heart of realpolitik in Jewish Canada. The key issue is not whether Jews differ on Quebec separatism, but agreement on whether Montreal bagels are really better than those baked in the rest of Canada (ROC). ROC is not a monolithic state. It consists of a number of regions whose Jewish demographics are dictated by the quality of their bagels.

When I was growing up in Winnipeg with a thriving Jewish population of over 22,000, bagels were delivered to the door by the breadman. Fluffy ring-shaped bread tied six to a string. Winnipeg never did adapt to bagel technology and as a result the Jewish population has declined to around 14,000.

Vancouver, on the other hand, got into the bagel thing more recently and its Jewish population has spurted to over 20,000. I have a friend who actually brings bagels from Vancouver to Toronto, insisting they are superior.

Montreal established a bagel style a long time ago to which it is stubbornly committed and its Jewish population has gone down, levelled off at 90,000 and holding. Now in Toronto, the city of opportunists, where you can buy bagels in any style, color, texture and flavor, satisfying all preferences, the Jewish population has exploded to 160,000 and counting.

Since the bagel business has become nonsectarian — even Sara Lee has gone into bagel baking — it is also reflected in national Canadian politics. I have it from a reliable source that the Liberals discovered the power of the bagel prior to the last federal election. But then they had a few people on their team who knew which was the bagel and which was the lox.

South Africa on cusp of change

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

"The only certainty in South Africa is uncertainty."

This truism, uttered by British parliamentarian Greville Janner six months ago, aptly summarizes the tense situation in South Africa on the eve of its first multiracial general election next week.

The election is a watershed — not only because it signifies a dramatic shift away from apartheid, but because Nelson Mandela, the leader of the African National Congress, is widely expected to win and become South Africa's first black president.

As white, black, colored and Asian South Africans get set to vote, the burning question is what black majority rule will eventually mean to whites.

Whatever happens in the future, the fate of South African Jews — a minority within a minority, as in Quebec — is doubtless linked with that of the wider Caucasian community.

As a community, South Africa's estimated 100,000 Jews, down from about 120,000 a decade ago, are probably psychologically better prepared for meaningful change than other whites.

Although the Jewish community reaped the political, economic and social benefits of apartheid, it would be fair to say that most Jews were morally uncomfortable with it and believed it was a passing phenomenon. As I discovered first-hand during a three-week trip to South Africa a decade ago, most Jews could not reconcile apartheid, a system of institutionalized racism and segregation, with the ethics of Judaism.

On the other hand, while criticizing "petty" manifestations of apartheid, such as separate public facilities and the ban against inter-racial marriage, many Jews were chary of dismantling the entire structure and replacing it almost immediately, if ever, with black majority rule.

Like their Afrikaner and British neighbors, Jews prospered under National party rule and thus rejected too abrupt a transition from apartheid to democracy. And, of course, Jews feared that the sleepless demon of anti-Semitism would be stirred if they were too closely identified with the struggle for freedom.

As a result, the Jewish Board of Deputies — the organizational umbrella group of South Africa Jewry — was officially neutral with respect to apartheid, though relatively vocal in its denunciation of "unjust discriminatory laws and practices based on race, creed or color."

This ambivalency, however, was not reflected in the voting patterns of Jews, many of whom cast their ballots for the decidedly anti-apartheid Progressive Federal party. One of its leading parliamentary representatives, the courageous Helen Suzman, was the personification of opposition to the government's stated policy of "separate development."

In disproportionate numbers, too, Jews joined the ranks of the African National Congress. More often than not, they were forced to flee their homeland and live as exiles until they were allowed to return in triumph.

South African President F.W. de Klerk.

And yet, in recent years, it was clear that the Afrikaner-based National party, which has wielded power since 1948, was making inroads into the community. In the 1980s, the most prominent Jewish "Nats" were Abe Hoppenstein, South Africa's consul in New York City, and Theo Aronson, the first Jewish MP to represent the National party. Recently, Louis Shill — a businessman — was appointed by President F.W. de Klerk as the country's first Jewish cabinet minister.

In next week's election, the National party will undoubtedly win the hearts and minds of some Jewish voters, mainly those who are impressed with the gradual political reforms de Klerk and his predecessor have introduced, alienated by the rising tide of crime, frightened by the growing black-on-black township violence that has claimed 10,000 lives in the past 10 years, and uncertain of the direction the new South Africa will take with Mandela at the helm.

By all accounts, the bulk of Jews will vote for the left-of-centre Democratic party, which is far less wedded to the past than the National party, but not as relatively radical as the African National Congress.

Whether by choice or circumstance, the Jewish community seems to have committed itself to the inevitable — black majority rule, which would have been unthinkable only a few short years ago.

When the process of reform got under way in 1984 with the unveiling of the so-called New Dispensation, which gave coloreds and Asians a limited franchise, the Jewish Board of Deputies hailed it as a precursor of "real change."

Not all Jews supported the New Dispensation, as it excluded blacks and left veto power in the hands of white legislators.

But the political momentum it unleashed emboldened the Jewish Board of Deputies, the representative body of the Jewish community.

In short order, it voiced "dismay" with the destruction by the authorities of shelters colored squatters had erected near Cape Town; appealed for an end to race-based quotas at universities; and urged reconsideration of an edict under which the government could detain people without bringing them to trial.

In March 1992, the Jewish Board of Deputies urged its constituents to vote "yes" in a nationwide referendum called by de Klerk to continue reforms aimed at abolishing apartheid and achieving a non-racial democratic society.

It was a break with the tradition — the first time in decades the board had taken a stand on such a pressing political issue.

The community was plainly relieved that the referendum, which paved the way for a multiracial council and an interim constitution, passed by an overwhelming margin.

According to reports, there had been a feeling that a vote against reform would only benefit reactionary whites and right-wing extremists like Eugene TerreBlanche, the leader of the anti-Semitic Afrikaner Resistance Movement.

It was, therefore, hardly surprising that Mervyn Smith, national chair of the Jewish Board of Deputies, hailed de Klerk's victory. As he put it: "I am particularly pleased that the far right, with its neo-Nazi posturing, has been firmly put in its place."

Nonetheless, as South African Chief Rabbi Cyril Harris commented last month, the Jewish community is "holding its breath" in the run-up to the April 26-28 election.

For his part, de Klerk is exuding official optimism. In a recent interview with the Jewish Telegraphic Agency of New York and the Jewish Chronicle of London, he assured Jews that South Africa is on the cusp of "a golden era."

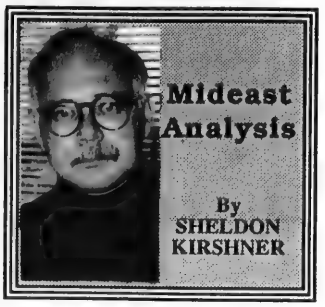
But there are skeptics, some with obvious agendas. Uri Gordon, head of the Jewish Agency's immigration and absorption department, has been quoted as saying that South African Jews are fearful of the future, and that emigration is on the upswing.

Rabbi Harris and Smith, though, have challenged these claims.

Regardless of who's right, no one can deny that South Africa, along with its Jewish community, is entering uncharted waters.

No wonder uncertainty is the byword as South Africa approaches a pivotal moment in its history.

Next week: Nelson Mandela, the Jews and Israel.



Some time soon, depending on the progress of Israel's arduous negotiations with the PLO on limited Palestinian autonomy, the Israeli army will redeploy its forces in the Gaza Strip, one of the most wretched places on this planet.

Israel has already begun the task of pulling out its troops from Arab-populated centres, and redeploying them in and around Gaza's Jewish settlements, whose fate has yet to be determined. Not until the five-year transitional period is completed and a final peace accord is signed with the PLO will Israel actually withdraw from Gaza, which was sealed off from Israel two weeks ago after a terrorist incident in Afula.

Jewish settlers in the territories and rightists in Israel have denounced last September's Israel-PLO accord. But no one else is shedding tears as Israel begins the process of bidding farewell to Gaza.

With a population of 800,000, 58 percent of whom are classified as refugees, Gaza is one of the most impoverished and densely-populated areas in the world.

Before the birth of Israel in 1948, Gaza was variously under British and Ottoman control. By the terms of the 1947 United Nations partition plan, Gaza was to have been part of a Palestinian state. But this entity was still-born when Gaza was occupied by Egypt.

From 1954 onward, the Egyptian government allowed Gaza to be turned into a deadly launching pad for Palestinian irredentism. A vicious cycle of Palestinian raids and Israeli retaliatory strikes pushed Egypt into the Soviet Union's sphere of influence, exacerbated Arab-Israeli tensions and planted the seeds of the 1956 Sinai war.

Israel captured Gaza in the 1967 Six Day War, and it has been a burden ever since, a hotbed of Palestinian nationalism and resistance which has often exploded into terrorism and exacted a high toll in Israeli lives. Indeed, by 1968, Gaza was in open revolt, and Yasser Arafat, the Fatah leader who would take command of the PLO in 1969, boasted: "The Israelis may rule Gaza by day. I rule by night."

Farewell to Gaza

Alarmed by the fast deteriorating security situation in Gaza, Israel ordered Ariel Sharon, the Israeli general, to impose a semblance of order there. To a large degree, Sharon succeeded in quelling the endemic violence.

Along with the stick, Israel held out a carrot, in the guise of an offer to resettle Palestinian refugees in permanent housing in Gaza. Most Palestinians regarded the scheme as a clever ploy to sweep the Palestinian problem under the rug.

In 1970, at the height of the War of Attrition with its Arab neighbors and the PLO, Israel built its first outpost in Gaza, Kfar Darom. More would follow, usually starting as nahals, or paramilitary positions. Today there are 17 settlements, with approximately 5,000 residents.

Although Gaza was more or less pacified by 1971, the bitterness and the resentment over Israel's occupation was never stamped out, and rebellion flared periodically, climaxing with the intifadah in December 1987. Observers were hardly surprised by the fact that the intifadah officially broke out in Gaza, in the teeming Jabaliya refugee camp.

Since then, the intifadah has waxed and waned, but nothing has really changed in Gaza, a stronghold of Islamic fundamentalism and an economic basketcase dependent on agriculture, with little industry and a catastrophic unemployment rate approaching 60 percent.

Israel's peace accord with the PLO has not stopped the killing in Gaza, nor has it slowed the popular ascent of Hamas, the PLO's rival. Hamas, for now, has stepped back from the brink of a physical power struggle with the PLO, but its concerted campaign of terror against Israeli soldiers and civilians, and by definition the peace agreement, continues unabated.

It's an open question whether the PLO can subdue Hamas after it takes over in Gaza. But no such doubt is apparent in the Israeli government's desire to get rid of this running sore on Israel's body politic. "I would like to see Gaza drown in the sea," Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin declared in exasperation a year ago. Gaza will not disappear, nor will its problems fade away, but Israel is finally taking concrete steps to unburden itself of this albatross.

A mistake is rectified

By AVA CARMEL
World Zionist Press Service

It took thousands of pioneers seven back-breaking years, but the draining of the Hula Lake and surrounding wetlands in the 1950s — the first project of national dimensions undertaken by the Jewish National Fund (JNF) — destroyed the breeding ground of the malaria-carrying Anopheles mosquito and allowed 15,000 acres of farmland to be reclaimed for the region's kibbutzim and moshavim.

The JNF is presently involved in another major undertaking — reflooding 250 acres of that same land. The question is, why?

While agricultural land along the margins of the valley continued to yield high crops, with record yields of wheat, cotton, peanuts, corn and alfalfa reported during the first years, the peat soil in the centre of the valley has deteriorated over the years.

"Peat absorbs up to 700 times its weight in water," said Amos Harpaz, director of JNF's northern afforestation region. "But when dry, it disintegrates and blows away in the wind."

Reflooding the area will also prevent the dry peat from catching fire and polluting the Kinneret with nitrates from the ashes.

The Hula rehabilitation project is being implemented by the JNF in co-operation with the Israel Lands Administration and the Ministry of Agriculture.

Over 70 bulldozers and earth-moving vehicles have dug a 250-acre depression. The artificial lake will be filled with water from the Jordan River and will be bordered by wetlands, as it once was.

For this first year, the region will be carefully monitored and, if all goes well, developed for tourism. The lake and wetlands will be transformed into an Israeli version of the Florida Everglades, and a safari park will be created, with animals for which the Hula was once a natural habitat. They will be raised on small islands in the marsh and visitors will be taken through the channels by boat. There will be bridges, observation points and specific areas for swimming, boating and fishing.

Lake and wetlands to be transformed into a safari park

Flora and fauna for the park will be taken mainly from the existing 800-acre nature reserve, established in the region when the swamps were drained. Migrating birds continue to stop in the area, albeit in greatly reduced numbers.

"There are many problems to overcome," said JNF project director Giora Shaham. How to control mosquitoes, which fish to stock the canals with and how to treat the lake's water are among them. Research will be conducted at the Migdal Galilee Technological Centre in Kiryat Shmona, which belongs to 33 settlements in the region.

Meanwhile, agriculture will continue in most of the valley and extensive research is presently being done on how to improve crops. "These fields can be worked, with a lot of patience," said agricultural consultant On Rabinovitch of Kibbutz Kfar Giladi. Rabinovitch has proven that peanuts, corn, sunflowers and beans can grow in the problematic peat.

"But as tourism becomes a more viable alternative," said Bunny Alexandroni, spokesperson for the JNF, "people living in the Hula Valley will be less dependent on agriculture."

A number of kibbutzim have already shown interest in developing private enterprises at the Hula natural springs on the eastern side of the valley. One is planning a second baptismal site on the Jordan River. And a third is considering a rare bird park.

The original Hula Project was based on the Zionist ideal of conquering the land; today's project is based on ecological ideals. "We now have to utilize what we have learned," Alexandroni said, "in order to improve the environment for the next generation."

Cultural program pays tribute to Holocaust victims

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The unspeakable was spoken, sung and choreographed at an evening of remembrance of those who perished in the Holocaust and of those who survived the Shoah. More than 1,500 people sat in silence at a program titled Cultural Reflections on the Holocaust: A Memorial in Music, Poetry and Art, held at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

The opening Presentation of Colors by Jewish War Veterans was followed by the recitation of names of people who perished in the Holocaust against a background of music sung by the Beth Tzedec and Beth Tikvah Choirs.

Readings from a script compiled by Beth Tzedec's Cantor Paul Kowarsky and Srul Irving Glick, composer-in-residence of Beth Tikvah Synagogue were interspersed throughout the program. Dramatizations in English and Yiddish narrated by Marilyn Lightstone, Vivian Reiss, Walter Soles, and Gerry Kane, expressed the pain and suffering, as well as the bravery, of Jews and gentiles — highlighting the indomitable spirit of Jews during one of the darkest chapters in Jewish history.

In memory of the six million who perished, a six-branched candelabra was lit by survivors, children of survivors, hidden children, a Righteous Gentile, liberating soldiers and resistance fighters.

A special tribute was paid to the Righteous Among the Nations — Gentiles who risked their lives to save the Jews. Lighting a candle for the Righteous Gentiles was Tibor Almasy, a North York resident who risked his life to save almost 400 Jews from execution.

As a junior officer in the Hungarian Royal Army, Almasy masterminded an armed resistance against German occupiers and their local Nazi affiliates, the Hungarian Arrow Cross. He instructed the terrified Jews to remove their yellow stars and hid their identity by dressing them in Hungarian army uniforms. Almasy fled to Canada during the Hungarian Revolution of 1956.

Cellist Coenraad Bloemendal played a Prayer from Jewish Life by Ernest Bloch; soprano Tracy Atin sang Roit Knosp'n Oif'n Shnei (Red Petals in the Snow); Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, senior Rabbi of Beth Tzedec recited Psalm 130; and Cantor Louis Danto of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda sang Shtiller, Shtiller (Quiet, quiet, let's be silent) an echo of the Yiddish language spoken by millions of those who perished.

Poems written by children in Terezin were read. Partisan stories and songs reflected the courage and dignity of those who experienced the Holocaust.

Other featured performers at the Yom Hashoah memorial evening included pianists Nadia Adler and Francine Kay, and dancer-choreographer Shula Saltzman. Gordon Kushner and Glick conducted the choirs.

The lights were dimmed for the conclusion of the program. Only the six candles illuminated the darkness as Cantor Kowarsky chanted the memorial prayer K'El Maleh Rachamim and Kaddish was recited; all present recited a pledge that our brethren will not be forgotten.

The program was held under the auspices of the Beth Tzedec Holocaust memorial committee and the Canadian Society of Yad Vashem.

Marilyn Light, chair of the Beth Tzedec's Hololcaust memorial committee told The CJN that, "To forget the lessons of the Holocaust is to doom the future. To remember and remind the world of its lessons is to safeguard the tomorrows."

Young women from Toronto Bnei Akiva perform the daglanut (a complicated set of manoeuvres with the Israeli flag) at the Yom Ha'atzmaut program at Shaarei Shomayim. [Alron photo]

Orthodox community marks Israel's Independence Day

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The change from near total darkness in the Shaarei Shomayim sanctuary to bright light mirrored the division between solemnity and joy, as Toronto's Orthodox community marked Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Teenagers from Bnei Akiva, the religious Zionist youth movement and Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot High School for Girls presented the bulk of the program. They were not much younger, Toronto Mizrachi president Howard Langer said in his welcome, than many of those soldiers who sacrificed their lives for the survival of the State.

A choir was composed of students from Or Chaim, accompanied by pianist David Kalir.

As candles illuminated the gloom, youngsters told the stories of six of those who died, those who went from the yeshivah to the battlefield, from study abroad to death in the Sinai desert, from an internment camp in Cyprus to an Arab massacre. Their ages varied — 20, 34, 26 — their early deaths rendering their stories even more pathetic.

Each story concluded with the eulogy pronounced for every Jewish martyr — Hashem yenakom damo (or dama), G-d will avenge his (or her) blood.

Consul General Dror Zeigerman noted that "even before we could say kaddish for the thousands who gave their lives, terrorists struck again, (referring to the suicide bombing of a bus in Hadera) proving that terror is alive and well, and the terrorist dream of destroying Israel is still alive, as well as the desire to kill Jews just because they are Jews."

Just as his generation was the settler generation, and the current generation, is the warring one, so, Zeigerman said, he hopes that the next will be the generation of geula, of redemption.

"We pray that never again will our children go to war...will our enemies rise up against us ...will we have to bury our dead."

Rabbi Avishai David, rosh yeshivah of Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot, called the evolution and well-being of Israel a reflection of Divine prophesy, and a symbol of the relationship between G-d and the Jewish people.

K'El Maleh Rachamim, the memorial prayer, was chanted by Shaarei Shomayim's Shlomo Sufrin, and Or Chaim student Jonathan Snowbell recited a psalm.

The traditional moment of silence was accompanied by the eerie wail of a warning siren.

As the lights gradually became brighter, the young people told the story of religious zionism in Israel, the kibbutzim, the hesder yeshivahs, the contributions made by religious young women to the poor, the troubled, the immigrant.

"Just as the Temple was destroyed because of sinat chinam (senseless hatred)," one participant said, "so will it be rebuilt because of this ahavat yisrael (this love of the the Jewish people)."

As darkness fell outside, the lights came on full force, and Yom Ha'atzmaut officially began with a highlight of the annual event, the daglanut, an intricate series of manoevres with Israeli flags presented by young women of Bnei Akiva. Their performance was greeted with applause, and enthusiastic cheers and yells.

A special Ma'ariv service, led by Sufrin, included Shir HaMaalot, the psalm of praise recited on Shabbat and holy days, sung to the tune of Hatikvah, the blowing of the shofar, and Ani Ma'amin, the affirmation of faith in G-d and in the coming of the Messiah.

The evening concluded with dancing in the synagogue social hall, to music by the Simcha Orchestra.

The annual service was sponsored by Mizrachi of Canada, Emunah Women of Toronto and Bnei Akiva of Toronto.

Endowment fund grows

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The endowment fund of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV) increased to close to $2 million in 1993 and the goal for this year is to double that amount, according to an article in the organization's publication, Federation.

"During the past year we solidified the organizational framework of the fund," says the article, "and we saw the establishment of 10 new family funds for a total of 19 within the endowment fund."

Federation says the endowment fund is professionally managed "and we are receiving a solid rate of return." All Jewish community organizations are being advised about the benefits of investing in endowment funds for the whole community on a pooled basis through the JFGV.

The report says the fund's distribution committee "has continued to make responsible distributions which are assisting in building our community for the future." This year, grants helped 33 young people attend programs in Israel, purchased Jewish books and portable classrooms for the community high school, funded three youth programs and provided funds for two emergency relief programs.

Big enough to be reliable, small enough to care...

French Jew recalls past horrors at B.C. Yom Hashoah service

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — For over 50 years Jannushka Jakoubovitch kept the horrible experience of her life in Nazi-occupied France locked inside her. But at the urging of Congregation Emanu-El's Rabbi Victor Reinstein, she agreed to tell a Holocaust remembrance day gathering what happened, recalling the events in an emotional speech.

At age five, she lived with her parents and brother in Paris when the Nazis marched in. "Although we considered ourselves French, I had to go to pre-school with my infamous yellow Star of David sewn on all my clothes," she said. "I was too young and happy to be going to school to rebel against such a condition — which I didn't understand anyway."

She remembers little, but said, "My joy didn't last too long. Soon, we received little cards with pictures of Marshal Petain [head of the Vichy collaborationist government] standing happily with the Germans, and other cards with Japanese people. This was followed rapidly by nasty, humiliating propaganda against Jews, showing them in their worst form, with crooked noses and long fingers grabbing money from poor innocent Christians. I felt ashamed and fearful of being a Jew."

After Jakoubovitch was beaten several times by older girls because of her Star of David, the teacher told her mother to keep her at home since the school couldn't guarantee her safety. She and her brother "had to stay alone in the apartment, not make any noise, not answer the bell and not go to the windows. We were prisoners in our own home."

Their father's shop windows were painted with big Stars of David and the word JEW. Stones were thrown and windows broken. Their little synagogue was bombed several times.

Then the family learned they were on the Nazis' deportation list and the children were farmed out to reluctant neighbors every night — because the Nazis always came at night. "I have no idea where my parents hid every night," she said.

The family lived near a police station and Jakoubovitch's mother could hear the Jewish children screaming each night after being separated from their parents, either waiting to be numbered, or sent to a waiting-station or to the railway station to be loaded on a train like animals for concentration camps.

"The people of Paris were relatively calm and seemed unaware that Hitler's deeds violated all human and international humanity," she said.

'Jews had no rights'

"Jews had no rights except to be taken to concentration camps and brutally killed. We were forbidden to go to the theatre, movies or parks, and had to travel on the last car of the metro. Curfew was at 8 p.m. Going through the streets of Paris with our Star of David became an ordeal.

"My mother, my brother and I were arrested by the Gestapo and sent to Drancy, a holding prison for Jews. We were released the next day but we knew we would be arrested again, and this time we would not come back.

"Finally, it became too dangerous and my brother and I were sent to the country to hide with the Maquis, the French resistance. We had very little food and we lived among the machine guns and rifles. We ... learned never to speak, even under torture. Eventually, all the partisans we were with were killed by the enemy. By incredible good luck my parents and my brother and I survived. Others from our family were wiped out at the death camps."

After the war, Jakoubovitch said, "Another type of war began for us. Our lives were affected forever. I didn't want to be a Jew because in my child's mind, to be a Jew meant humiliation, fear, torture and death. The only way to save my sanity was to try to erase my memory of those terrible times. My brother and I, until this very day, have never spoken about the war and my parents never gave us any explanations.

"For a while I changed my name to a very French one. I denied being a Jew and refused to admit what happened to me and my family."

Eventually, after working with the United Nations in Vienna, Jakoubovitch was able to come to Canada with her two children.

Now, she said, "I cry every night for those who died in such a horrible way — I hope not in vain. We'll always remember them and cherish their memories. I can only talk about us as Jews now because I am one, and that is my story. I believe now that God had a purpose for my survival. I have two children and through them I'll survive and so my family will be able to tell our story to their children and grandchildren. I ask myself today . . .why . . why do we have to suffer so much. . . why?"

The service at the Holocaust memorial in the Victoria Jewish Cemetery, included a kaddish written for the camps and ghettos, a reading from The Diary of Anne Frank, the K'El Maleh Rachamim and a silent prayer after the Mourner's Kaddish.

Jack Gardner paid tribute to Willie Jacobs and his wife, survivors who helped raise the funds for the memorial, and who were active in Holocaust education. Both died last fall within a few weeks of each other.

Community pays respects to Israel's fallen soldiers

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hundreds of people paid their respects to fallen Israeli soldiers at a dignified service held last week at Adath Israel Synagogue for Yom Hazikaron.

"We pray and hope that the memory of the fallen will give us the courage to fight for peace and security," said Israeli consul-general Dror Zeigerman. "We pray that never again will a Jewish boy or girl have to go to battle for our land, never again will our enemies rise up to destroy us, and that never again will we have to bury our war heroes."

Rabbi Irwin Witty, executive director of the Board of Jewish Education, spoke of the juxtaposition of pain at the loss of life and pride and gratitude on the [46th] anniversary of the establishment of the State of Israel.

"We are all impoverished by [the deaths of Israeli soldiers]," said the rabbi. "Of how many brilliant authors, caring physicians, outstanding lawyers, scholars, researchers, agronomists...were we deprived as a result of the deaths of these men and women?" he asked. "We are all mourners," he reminded the crowd.

Rabbi Witty said that David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, sent many hand-written letters of condolence to parents who had lost children in the defence of the new state. He read excerpts from two such letters.

Members of Zabar, an Israeli scout group in Toronto, took part in Hebrew and English readings and solemnly lowered the Israeli flag to half-mast as Alex Sorin sounded Taps. The scouts also participated in the lighting of memorial candles along with Tsipi Erez, whose husband Oded died in 1975, and Shlomit Zohar, whose brother, Avner Dital, died in the Yom Kippur War.

Toronto aliyah shaliach Ehud Savion, who served in the Israeli Marine Force for 25 years, read the Order of the Day from Chief of Staff Ehud Barak, saluting the memory of Israel's fallen soldiers.

K'El Maleh Rachamim was chanted by Cantor Efraim Sapir of Beth Tikvah Synagogue. The Ne'Imot choir enhanced the service with melodious Hebrew music, as did soloists Israel David and Ilana Millman who sang On a Silver Platter and They shall beat their swords into ploughshares respectively. Both were accompanied by Doron Ophir.

Also participating in the program were Shimon Zeraviv, Brig. Gen. (Res.) Doron Kadmiel, Lt. Oren Lapsker (Res.), and Shimon Inbar.

JCC tennis courts are to be rebuilt

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the past several years, tennis aficionados at the North branch of the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) have been playing under a cloud.

Each year the courts deteriorate a little more and get a little more unplayable. Several years ago, some of the tennis regulars were concerned about a plan that would have seen the courts relocated to the current site of the parking lot, put under a dome and to come under private operation.

But last week, the sun broke through some of those dark clouds as North York City Council passed a motion that could see $230,000 pumped into the courts to rebuild them and bring them up to standard.

The motion, proposed by Ward 7 Councillor Mike Feldman, will see the courts turned over to the city under a lease arrangement. North York will be responsible for $80,000 of the refurbishing cost while matching funds are expected from the provincial and federal levels of government under the federal/provincial initiative for infrastructure improvements, Feldman told The CJN.

Should that funding come through, the courts will be redone completely, windscreens will be improved and a "shack" at the site will be renovated and upgraded and turned into a changing room, he said.

Harold Cipin, director of operations for the JCC, said if approval for matching funds comes within a few weeks there is still a chance the courts could be upgraded this summer. If not, they will be rebuilt for next season.

Cipin said the courts will be operated under the auspices of the North York Tennis Association and will be open to the public.

When all the work is completed, seven doubles and one singles court will be available. Because of wear and tear, there are currently only four doubles courts available for play, Cipin said.

The JCC, which is strapped for cash, does not have the funds to upgrade the courts on its own, he added.

Feldman said the idea for North York's involvement in the tennis courts originated with JCC member Tibor Martinek, who suggested it to him.

Leket aims to boost Jewish Agency's image

'Opening a new era'

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yehiel Leket's recent appointment as acting chair of the Jewish Agency and World Zionist Organization (WZO) has given him until June 10 — and perhaps longer — to show his mettle. The agency's board of governors will meet at that time to decide the next step in choosing a permanent chair.

Leket, 52, replaced Simcha Dinitz, whose recent indictment for fraud and breach of trust left the agency with problems which were Leket's immediate priority on being appointed.

He spent his first month as acting chair working with senior staff of the agency to boost morale. He wanted to "bring the message that we are opening a new era," he told The CJN during a recent interview held in the office of Toronto's aliyah shaliach, Udi Savion.

While individual departments within the Jewish Agency, such as Youth Aliyah, have a good image, said Leket, the agency's image has suffered. "That's what we need to change."

Leket's plan is first to educate the agency's 2,000 staff members by arranging visits to agency projects, then to extend invitations to public opinion leaders from "almost every [sector of the community] — business, education, the army, politics" so that they can also become better informed.

Equal partners

Donations to the agency, which is the primary recipient of United Jewish Appeal funds raised for Israel, have not been affected by the Dinitz scandal, Leket said. (Reports that Dinitz had misused agency credit cards came to light in late 1992.) The agency has a budget of $500 million a year.

Leket had arranged his recent five-day trip to Toronto and Montreal as chair of the agency's Youth Aliyah department, a position he still holds. While here, he met with Federation and Canadian Zionist Federation leaders in both cities as well as with Habonim Dror, B'nai Brith, a group of departing olim, Na'amat (for which he holds a special affection as an alumnus of their Israeli kindergarten), and Montreal's Herzliah High School.

The visit was not a bid to raise his profile outside of Israel, Leket maintained. Although he had the support of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin to become acting chair, Leket faced opposition from those who said he was not well enough known internationally.

"I'm not here to campaign," said Leket, admitting that he would like to have the permanent position.

Leket feels his own strength lies in his knowledge of the agency and of Israeli government. The agency is considered a quasi-governmental body. Leket is a former member of Knesset and has also served as head of the Aliyah Mission in North America, chair of the World Labor Zionist Movement, head of the Settlement Division of WZO and a member of the executive of WZO and the Jewish Agency.

In his meetings with local Zionist leadership, Leket stressed that the Jewish Agency and UJA are equal partners. He disputes Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin's recent well-publicized comments on Diaspora fundraising. "He's totally wrong," said Leket. "I never felt that I asked for charity. I always felt that I asked for contributions — of the mind and the heart as well as the money. I didn't consider it philanthropy. I consider it a partnership. When Jewry gives [money] to bring half a million olim to Israel, this is a common venture."

To cease giving money will affect "the weakest part of Israeli society" including olim and children, said Leket. Israel has 600,000 people living below the poverty line, he added.

A recent survey of 450 Jewish Agency members both in Israel and the Diaspora found that shared priorities included aliyah and absorption, Jewish education in the Diaspora, youth aliyah and enhancing the quality of life in Israel. Increasing aliyah, particularly from the former Soviet Union, is a priority for Leket, as is emphasizing the primacy of Israel for all Jews.

Correction

In the obituary on Dr. Max Florence, a dentist and founder of the Toronto branch of the Dental Volunteers for Israel, in the March 31 issue of The CJN the name of one of his daughters was omitted. As well as leaving wife Rochelle and children Lloyd and Ira, Florence also left daughter Michele. The CJN regrets this error.

Mengele twin describes her return to Judaism

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It was the melody of a Hebrew song that brought Sora Vigorito fully back into the Jewish fold.

As a child, she had been tortured at Auschwitz, one of 89 pairs of identical twins expiremented on by Dr. Joseph Mengele. The Nazis murdered all her loved ones except her father, whom she met for the first time after the war. Then death pulled him away from her, too.

As an adolescent, Vigorito was befriended by a nun in an American orphanage who slowly gained her trust.

"I poured out my anger to her," the Cleveland native recently told an audience at the Chabad Lubavitch Community Centre in Thornhill.

"How could God take away my mother, my sisters, my family, and now my father? Why? What had I done in my young life for God to punish me? What kind of God was He?"

The nun explained to her that the Jews were meant to suffer because they had forsaken the Christian messiah.

Vigorito had recurrent nightmares. Her experiences at Auschwitz had left her feeling dirty, impure, unworthy. Seeking redemption, she joined a Christian prayer group, married a non-practising Catholic, had three children, and earned a master's degree in comparative religion.

She observed both Christian and Jewish holidays. Although her husband tolerated her spiritual eccentricities, she was fired from her job teaching comparative religion at a Catholic girl's school for delving too deeply into Judaism.

Her church-going also ended abruptly, after she complained privately to the priest following a service in which the Jews were vilified for killing Christ.

"He chased me out of the church, shouting, 'You damn Jew, get out, get out!' I went out and I never came back."

It was during a synagogue service that Vigorito heard the melody of Ani Ma'amin for the first time since Auschwitz. She got goose bumps, chills, tremors, nausea.

"Suddenly, I was reliving some of the most horrible moments of my life."

Vigorito was 3½ when she and her twin Hanna were housed in Mengele's second story laboratory at Auschwitz-Birkenau. "My sister and I were his lab animals," she said.

The sisters received spinal injections, which gave Hanna convulsions, and Mengele injected the tuberculosis virus into Sora. He scraped away at bone, and performed other operations, all without anesthetics. Hanna died in her sister's arms two weeks before liberation.

Sora and Hanna could see bodies piled through a hole in the crematorium wall. They also heard Ani Ma'amin sung every night by hundreds of voices. She never knew what it was called.

"We heard the melody and then we'd hear the screaming. And then the screaming would die down and it would be silent. And then we'd hear this metallic cranking. We heard it all the time."

She didn't hear it again until that day in synagogue. She said she is the only Mengele twin still alive.

Vigorito soon found out the Hebrew lyrics of Ani Ma'anim were from Maimonides's 13th principle of faith. They were a proclamation of undying faith in God — "even if He shall delay."

She said she was beside herself when she finally understood the lyrics. "Every night I heard those people who could no longer deny their fate; the smell of their fate was in the air, there was no possibility to escape the fate before them. They were proclaiming their belief in God. And I thought 'I want a faith like that. I don't know how to get it but I want that.' "

Hearing Ani Ma'amin sparked her return to Orthodox Judaism. She sought out the Lubavitcher Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson in Brooklyn for advice on the recommendation of another rabbi.

"I told the Rebbe I was a Mengele twin, the only one alive, a Ba'al Tshuva, that I had koshered my home ... I said, 'Here I am before you, and my husband is not Jewish. I'm ready to do what the Torah says I must do, but I need strength. Can you give me strength, Rebbe?'

"He looked up at me and I can't describe the look in his eyes. The Rebbe said, 'Don't divorce your husband. Separate yourself from him, don't have any physical contact with him, sleep in another room and everything will be fine.'"

Vigorito followed that advice, and her husband acquiesced under protest. For several months, he was mysteriously absent at regular intervals.

One day he told her he had arranged a meeting for them with the rabbi. She feared he had arranged a divorce.

But to her amazement, the rabbi told her her husband had been studying Judaism and wished to convert. Several months later, they were married according to Jewish law beneath a chupah.

Assimilation called major threat to survival of Diaspora Jewry

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — If North American Jewry is to survive, it must deal with the problem of assimilation says a history professor at Union College in New York State.

Stephen Berk was scholar-in-residence at the recent Sam and Sarah Kerzner Holocaust Studies Institute Yom Hashoah remembrance weekend, sponsored by the adult education committee at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

"Only when the Jewish community deals with this problem can we truly say, 'Am Yisrael Chai.' " Berk said.

He said assimilation is an even greater problem than such racists as U.S. Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan.

Farrakhan's extreme views are only one form of anti-Semitism, he explained.

"I wish that I could say that the death of the six million Jews could prevent the anti-Semitic impulse, but only an idiot would deny that impulse in our time. It is found in France, Canada, the United States and most emphatically in the former Soviet Union.

"With the tremendous level of economic distress in places such as Moscow or Odessa, the resurgence of anti-Semitism and the growing power of [Russian ultra-nationalist] Vladimir Zhirinovsky should come as no surprise.

"Another problem is that a large number of Russian people cannot come to grips with the fact that there is no longer a Soviet Union and that the Russian people and state have been reduced to secondary status in the world," Berk said.

"Zhirinovsky bases his appeal on addressing the grievances of a large number of Russians... He plays to a background of long-standing anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism and claims that Jews control everything. In a recent public opinion poll, a large number of Russians agreed that Jews have too much control over Russian society."

Berk believes the most important international issue of our time — "the real problem of the 20th century is whether or not Russia can move in the direction of democracy ... The peace and tranquility of the 21st century rests on what happens in Moscow. The future of our planet depends on the evolution of Russian politics."

But, he said, Jews should keep in mind that North American Jewry is the most privileged group of Jews in history. In spite of world-wide anti-Semitism, "what we have to worry about is assimilation.

"In the United States since 1985, 52 per cent of Jews have married out of the faith and I suspect that the problem is coming to Canada," he warned.

Lag b'Omer celebration planned

TORONTO — A celebration of Lag b'Omer will be held Thursday evening, April 28, featuring a barbecue, bonfire, live music and dancing at Earl Bales Park in North York.

Lag b'Omer celebrates the life and teachings of Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai, who stood for Jewish unity and world peace. He passed away over 1,800 years ago, and since then the day has been marked, especially by youth.

The evening will kick off at 7 p.m. with a welcome from Rabbi Yoseph Y. Zaltzman, executive director of the Jewish Russian Community Centre. Several thousand people are expected to attend.

For more informationn please call the Jewish Russian Community Centre of Toronto at (416) 222-7105.

Why Benjamin's?
Some differences matter more than others when funeral arrangements have to be made. One is being able to talk to a funeral director who is Jewish, for the depth of understanding and the 'feel' for tradition.
Another contrast at Benjamin's is the many years' experience of staff who supervise proceedings to the minutest detail.
On the other hand, there's usually very little difference in cost between chapels. Regardless. The price for identical products and services may vary slightly, but there's no comparison in quality.
According to families who have experienced it firsthand, these differences mean everything.

Soberman was teacher of Holocaust studies

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Susan Soberman, who died suddenly of a heart attack earlier this month, touched the hearts of many people in the Toronto community.

Soberman, a devoted Holocaust educator and English teacher at York Mills Collegiate, was born in Toronto 48 years ago.

She was an active member of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, the Holocaust education committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Society for Yad Vashem (of which she was a founder) and the now defunct Canadian Association for Ethiopian Jews. She also served as staff advisor to York Mills' NAHON (North American High School Organization Network) group.

"Susan was passionate about Holocaust education and the struggle to end anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial," said Karen Mock, national director of the League for Human Rights. "She was intense about her work, very sensitive and completely devoted to teaching. We will all miss her."

Mock had worked with Soberman on the Holocaust and Hope Educators' Study Tour, a League program including visits to concentration camps in Germany and Poland and a Holocaust-related tour of Israel. Soberman chaired the Holocaust and Hope advisory committee. A fund has been set up at the League in her memory and another fund is now being organized at York Mills.

She spent her summer vacations for the past decade doing volunteer work in Israel, said long-time friend Karen Solomon. She taught English to Ethiopian olim, whom she also helped by bringing them clothing, raising funds and assisting them in finding employment.

"She often talked about wanting to help people," said Soberman's friend and fellow teacher Roz Lofsky. "She wanted to make a difference."

Soberman was a pioneer in Holocaust education in North York. Former student Isabel Vincent wrote to the North York Board of Education that Soberman's teaching of the Holocaust "helped me to put my life into greater perspective by fostering within me a stronger sense of toferance...Miss Soberman's course should be subtitled, A Course on How to Become a Better Citizen."

Former student Adam Minsky, chair of the Youth for Youth committee of the Holocaust Remembrance Committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, credits Soberman with sparking his interest in community Holocaust remembrance work. She had asked him to do a reading at a Yom Hashoah service and worked with him so that he was able to read in a "powerful, moving way. She was always very kind and very supportive." Minsky recalls.

Soberman had an interest in drama dating back to her high school days at Vaughan Road Collegiate, said Lofsky. She appeared in a production of Showboat when she was studying to be a teacher at the University of Toronto.

Soberman was "a good friend and a good listener [who was] very loyal and generous with her time," said Lofsky.

Pnina Zilberman, director of the Holocaust Remembrance Committee, described Soberman as "a gitte neshama," and stressed the importance of continuing the work that Soberman began.

In addition to her community work and her students, Soberman was devoted to her family and enjoyed tracking down distant relatives, among them Russian olim whom she visited every summer. Her parents, Tillie and Cantor Morris Soberman, who served Beth Tzedec Congregation for almost 40 years as Chazan Sheini and bar mitzvah teacher, immigrated to Toronto in the 1920s.

Soberman is survived by her parents and her brother Allan.

Himel was a supporter of Yiddish education

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ben Himel, a well-respected Toronto businessman, a firm supporter of Yiddish education and a stalwart of the Labor Zionist movement, died recently at the age of 90.

Born in Lagov, Poland, in 1904, Himel followed his father and his brother to Toronto in 1919. In 1928, he founded the B.A. Himel Co., which later developed into the Union Felt Products, that supplied raw filling materials, such as cotton, wool and foam, to the furniture and bedding industries.

His sons, Mel and Irving, who worked with him, told The CJN that their father, known affectionately as "B.A.," was "a good person. He was an honest man, who lived a life full of integrity."

The company is now associated with Vita PLC, a major British foam manufacturer, and operates 11 factories across Canada.

Yiddish education was a passion, and he worked hard to support it. In Toronto, he was a driving force behind the Borochov Shule and Kindergarten, and was a major benefactor and board member of Bialik Hebrew Day School, where the preschool is dedicated in the name of Ben Himel and his first wife, Edith.

He recently established the Ben Himel Endowment for the Advancement of Yiddish Studies at the University of Toronto.

Himel believed that Yiddish should be a part of the educational world in Israel as well. He established endowments to help promote it and train teachers of Yiddish at Tel Aviv and Bar-Ilan Universities, and at the Foundation for the Advancement of Jewish Studies.

A strong Zionist, he was very involved with Histadrut, Amal Schools and Kupat Holim, serving as chairman of the board of directors of the Borochov Cultural Centre and national vice-chairman of the Israel Histadrut campaign.

He was also on the board of State of Israel Bonds and the Board of Jewish Education.

Contributed to many charitable causes

He contributed to many charitable organizations in Toronto and Israel, including United Jewish Appeal.

Advanced age did not appreciably slow him down, his family said, noting that he went to the office every day until the day he went to the hospital for his final illness, and daily went out for lunch with his sons.

His hobby was fishing, something "he did every summer and dreamt about every winter," remembered son Mel. The Himel cottage on Lake Simcoe was a focal point for family gatherings.

Himel was predeceased by his first wife, Edith, sister Ann Pearl and brothers Sam and Marcus.

He is survived by his second wife, Anne, children Pearl and Jerry Banks, Irving, Mel and Pam, and Miriam Freilich, grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Woman discovers father's grave in Poland

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For 49 years Irene Gray of Thornhill wondered where her father was buried. Now she has learned her father, Herman Tuvel, escaped the evacuation march from Auschwitz but was killed a few miles from the camp.

She also learned, to her great surprise, that her father's grave in the Polish town of Przyczowic has been cared for by strangers all these years and a tomb erected to honor Tuvel and three other victims of Auschwitz. Tuvel was 47 when he died.

"There are some good Poles. These four women didn't have to do it, they don't know me or any one in our family. It was an unselfish act," Gray said.

The four who discovered and cared for the grave are Elizbieta Kocur, Emilia Widuch, Helena Dlugosz and Magdalena Wisniewska of Pryzczowic.

The news reached Gray and her broher, Andy Tuvel of Nobelton, Ont., from a researcher in Israel who came across the family name in a Polish newspaper account of the grave and its victims.

"When my brother called me with the news it was a moment of conflicting emotions," Gray said. "I was glad though to know at least where my father is."

She said she wants to see the grave and thank those caring for it, but cannot now because her husband, Nathan, is ill in hospital, and her brother and his wife are also ill.

Only Gray and her brother survived. Her mother, Freda, went to her death in the gas chambers at the age of 43. Her father, a leading merchant in their home town of Munkacs, Hungary (now part of the Ukraine) had his nose broken by the S.S. and was sent to Auschwitz as an example to the rest of the town's 35,000 Jews.

"My mother, brother and I were sent to Auschwitz later and just by accident I saw my father from quite a distance. He shouted to me 'Where is mother?' and I said, 'She was sent away with the older people.' I didn't know what had happened to her but when he heard my words my father knew instantly."

According to the Polish newspaper, it was not until 1986 that the town fathers of Przyczowic decided to recognize the deed of the Polish women and to pay tribute to the Holocaust victims by erecting a a tomb cover for the grave. The mayor and other dignitaries of Gieraltowice County spoke at the service.

Stone cutters Raytmund Skrzpczyk and Zenon Koziel contributed their labor to making the tomb cover and it was Jolanta Krawiec, a school teacher, who suggested the memorial. Henryk Kopiece was the fundraising coordinator. The Przyczowic primary school undertook to take care of the tomb.

The newspaper story said Tuvel and three others escaped from their Nazi guards on an evacuation march. The four escapees were hidden in the house of public school principal Karol Elsner and his wife, Malgonata. Unfortunately, the fighting moved near Pryczowic and the four were killed and buried in a common grave at the local cemetery.

"The story is not clear about how my father was killed, who was fighting and who killed him," Gray said.

Also buried in the grave beside Herman Tuvel is Dziagimo di Veroli brought to Auschwitz from a temporary camp, Passoli de Capri, in Italy, and two unknown prisoners.

Gray's brother, Andy, escaped during the Auschwitz evaucation and hid in a barn, but the Polish farmer saw him and informed the S.S. "They couldn't find my brother in the barn and said they would burn it down. The farmer pleaded with them that it would take away his livelihood, so they relented. My brother heard the argument and ran away."

A girl of 16 when she was sent to Auschwitz, Gray survived by working with 200 others in a Krupp munitions factory near Breslau. She weighed 60 pounds when liberated. In 1946, she and her brother hoped to go to Israel but the new state had not yet been declared and they found no way of getting there. They came to Canada in 1949.

Eight of her mother's brothers and sisters died in the Holocaust, Gray said.

Uncertainty about her father's death has ended for Irene Gray of Thornhill, shown here as a girl of 10 in 1938, with her brother Andy, 12, and her parents, Freda and Herman Tuvel. She has just learned that her father's grave has been looked after for 49 years by four Polish women. Her mother died in Auschwitz. Her father escaped the evacuation march from Auschwitz but was later killed.

Jewish, Chinese groups unite to fight racism

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress and the Chinese Canadian National Council (CCNC) have joined forces to publish an anti-racism booklet entitled Resisting Hate.

The glossy and colorful booklet boasts high production values and is intended as an educational tool for schools and individuals in both communities and for the wider public as well.

It will be offered to schools, community centres and all 11 Ontario chapters of the CNCC, said John Tang, the organization's executive director.

"It will be mailed to every board of education in Ontario and I hope it will be used to teach how to resist hate," added Gerda Frieberg, chair of Congress' Ontario region.

The booklet, funded by a grant from the Ontario Ministry of Citizenship, outlines briefly the history of both communities and how they have struggled against prejudice and discrimination. As part of its seven "lessons," the booklet describes the attitude of the Canadian government to Jewish immigration in the 1930s and how Congress has subsequently opposed manifestations of hatred against Jews and other groups.

It also tells how the CCNC originated in 1979 when Chinese Canadians united to protest stereotyped depictions of Chinese students on a television news program.

Each lesson is followed by a number of suggested questions to be posed to students for discussion. In one instance following a section titled Refugees fighting back, students are asked to discuss how a small racial or ethnic minority might defend itself against racist attacks.

The pamphlet will be distributed to Chinese students taking English as a second language, Tang said, adding a Chinese-language version of the booklet is planned.

Production of the pamphlet "is in keeping with the mandate of Congress to continue to seek partners with whom we can jointly produce material to help counter racism and anti-Semitism," Frieberg said. "This is a unique model that other communities can follow."

The booklet is a joint project of Congress, the CCNC, the Ontario Anti-Racism Secretariat and the Ontario Ministry of Citizenship. Contributors include historian Paula Draper and graphic artist Jim Woo.

Stern named head of Vaad

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Rabbi Moshe Stern, spiritual leader of Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue in Toronto, recently became president of the Vaad Harabonim of Greater Toronto. He succeeds Rabbi Henry Hoschander.

Other officers are vice-president Rabbi Yaakov Felder of Shomrai Shabbas and secretary Rabbi Raphael Marcus of B'nai Torah.

The Vaad, which was founded in 1982, is an organization of Orthodox rabbis.

Rabbi Stern was born and raised in Montreal, and received smicha (rabbinic ordination) from the Rabbinical College of Canada-Lubavitcher Yishiva and from Rabbi Pinchus Hirshprung, the chief rabbi of Montreal.

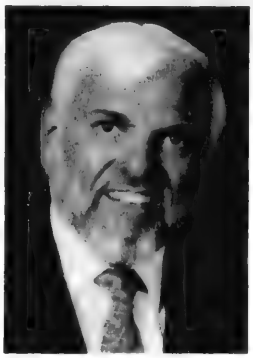
He received his secular education at Sir George William University in Montreal, the University of Georgia and the University of Alabama, earning degrees in political science and philosophy.

Rabbi Stern's first professional position was assistant rabbi in Savannah, Ga. He then became rabbi of Knesseth Israel Congregation in Mountain Brook, Ala., where, besides revitalizing the Orthodox community, he helped establish a Jewish day school. He was active in communal organizations and was president of the Zionist Organization there.

In 1980, he came to Shaarei Tefillah.

Although the Vaad Harabonim is unquestionably Orthodox, Rabbi Stern stresses it is intended "to serve the entire Jewish community, in terms of providing needed and required services that only an organized Vaad can."

Rabbi Yitzchak Kerzner, for instance, "a longstanding member of the Vaad, is chairman of the Kashruth Council, and together with other members of the Vaad, supervises kashruth in the community."



Rabbi Moshe Stern

A permanent beth din (rabbinic court) under the direction of Rabbi Mordechai Ochs issues gittin (Jewish divorces) and another one deals with matters of conversions, adoptions and disputes related to business and related matters.

The various beth dins take their work very seriously, Rabbi Stern said. "When issues are decided, it is expected that they will be implemented by those involved. Those who refuse to co-operate are effectively barred from membership or honors in the various synagogues."

Rabbi Stern cited the example of husbands who refuse the beth din's directive to issue their wives a get. "The rabbis will use every means within their powers to see that such a person is effectively ostracized from the community until such time as he will do what is right and proper."

In their experience in Toronto, Rabbi Stern asserts, "in almost all instances, the husband co-operates."

Another significant concern of the Vaad is, with the guidance of Rabbi Shlomo Miller and with the blessing of the late Rabbi Abram Price, to "redefine and bring up to standard" the Toronto eruv, which allows observant Jews to carry on Shabbat.

Rabbi Stern emphasized the Vaad serves the entire Jewish community, not just the Orthodox, and that everyone should feel they have the right to avail themselves of its services.

"The Vaad is concerned with the direction of the Jewish community. It recognizes that in attempting to combat assimilation and indifference, we need to strengthen Jewish schools and provide a Jewish education for every Jewish child.

"As well, parents must recognize that synagogues and schools are here to reinforce what children see and experience in terms of Jewish content in their homes. The Vaad as a body encourages every Jewish family to consider strengthening their personal commitment to Torah and observance, and we stand ready to help anyone who wishes to turn to us for guidance."

Toronto, he said, can take pride that "by and large the entire Orthodox Jewish community is united in its concern for Israel, and in its efforts locally to enhance Jewish life for everyone."

While Rabbi Stern is noted for (and makes no bones about) his somewhat controversial right-wing political views on Israeli politics, the Vaad itself, and he as its president, is totally non-political. "Each and every one of us has his particular view of current political issues (like the peace process) and collectively we pray for peace. We take no back seat in our concern and love for Israel."

The rabbi is also concerned with Holocaust matters, something he became sensitized to by his wife, Sarah, a teacher at Beth Jacob High School, and the child of survivors. The Sterns have five children and six grandchildren.

For more information about the Vaad Harabonim of Greater Toronto, contact Rabbi Stern at Shaarei Tefillah (416) 787-1631 or executive secretary Rabbi Yechiel Benayon at (416) 636-0865.

Survivors urged to share stories

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Survivors were urged to share their stories so their children could keep alive the memory of the Holocaust at a recent Yom Hashoah commemoration gathering here that drew an unprecedented 600 people of all ages.

Adas Israel Synagogue was filled to capacity for the annual program, which this year marked the 50th anniversary of the deportation of Hungarian Jews.

In their memory, and that of the 6 million, candles were lit by Hungarian survivors.

Guest speaker Steve Paikin, a former Hamiltonian, brought home the importance of survivors sharing their experiences with his account of how he came to make his widely acclaimed documentary, Return to the Warsaw Ghetto.

Accompanying a friend and his father, a Hungarian-born survivor, on their first trip back to Auschwitz in 1992, Paikin witnessed how, during the four-and-a-half hour bus ride from Warsaw to Auschwitz, the father broke his silence and for the first time, told his son of his experiences.

Until then, as Paikin put it, "for 48 years of the father's life and all of the son's life," father and son had maintained "an uneasy silence."

For Paikin, the moment he will never forget came when the survivor, having said Kaddish for the father who had died in his arms, "looked up at heaven and said 'Look, Papa, what I have brought back for you — a living monument!' "

It was then he decided to make a documentary and the following year, on the 50th anniversary of the Warsaw Uprising, the TVO producer and host of Between the Lines and Fourth Reading, went back to film the return to Warsaw of three survivors and their children.

"It was terribly painful but, as all agreed afterwards, terribly necessary," said Paikin as he urged those survivors who have not been back, "to go, if you can, and to tell your children."

Wearing a yellow label on his lapel with the words Never Forget, Hamilton mayor Bob Morrow said nothing in history has come even "remotely close" to the Holocaust, and that in order to prevent it from ever happening again, "we must always learn and know what happened in the past."

On behalf of Federation president David Steinberg, who was in Israel, past president CeCe Schreiber called on the second generation to join the Holocaust remembrance committee and keep the story of the Holocaust alive.

Beth Jacob director of education, Larry Katz, read the names of 400 relatives of local survivors who lost their lives.

Committee chair Gary Frydman opened the program and Cantor David Bercovici chanted the K'El Maleh Rachamim and led the Kaddish.

Also taking part were Rabbi Morton Green of Adas Israel congregation, who read one of his own poems; Hamilton Hebrew Academy principal Rabbi Zev Eisenstein; Cantor Ruth Slater of Temple Anshe Sholom; students Samantha Berlin and Barbara Boswell, and teenagers Michael Leon and Michael Albert, with material they had written themselves; Ilana Karan, Leonid Karan, Charlotte Price, Brian Albert and Marvin Rosenshein.

JFGT nominations

Jack Chisvin, nominating committee chairman for the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, has announced nominations for officers and members of the Federation's executive board.

Elections will be held during the Federation's 19th annual meeting, scheduled for June 21, 1994 at 7:30 p.m. at the Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst Street.

In accordance with Federation by-laws, no nominations can be made from the floor during the annual meeting. However, any member of the Jewish community may be placed in nomination to the Federation executive board or officers' group by complying with the following by-laws:

"Each nomination to the executive board must be accompanied by seven (7) supporting signatures. Each nomination for an officer must be accompanied by 20 supporting signatures. The nomination, in writing, must be delivered to the Federation administrative offices at 4600 Bathurst Street, Suite 538, no later than 42 days before the annual meeting. The nominations must be accompanied by written consent of the nominee. All nominees must be in good standing with the United Jewish Appeal."

Special needs Shabbat

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg synagogues are planning a "special needs Shabbat" for handicapped Jewish community members Saturday, April 23.

Reform congregation Temple Shalom, which does not hold Saturday services, is planning a potluck supper and singalong Friday night.

The special program is being co-ordinated by the religious affairs subcommittee of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council.

"We felt April 23 was an appropriate choice for this dedication because parshah Kedoshim has many references to special needs," said comminty member Rabbi Jeffrey Gale of Temple Shalom.

Religious affairs subcommittee chair Dr. Allen Kraut said synagogue representatives and the Council of Rabbis reacted favorably to the event. Each synagogue will mark the day in its own way.

At the Orthodox Talmud Torah-Beth Jacob Synagogue, residents of Shalom Residences, a Jewish home for the mentally handicapped, have been participating in the services for years.

"Since the Torah readings are cyclical, each year we can build on what we start this year and add more," said Kraut.

Al Waxman takes on a new role

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Al Waxman, the King of Kensington, is moving away from the cameras to direct A Shayna Maidel (A Beautiful Girl), a play about two sisters and a father, and how the Holocaust scorched their lives.

Though he was only nine when World War II ended, Waxman is not unfamiliar with the theme of A Shayna Maidel. His first important role in the late 1950s was in Sun In My Eyes, a film adaptation of Child of the Holocaust by Jack Kuper. He played the author, who did not survive, and the late Toby Robins of Toronto was his older sister. The director was the late Harvey Hart of Toronto. The actor met many survivors who came to the Waxman family home for meals.

But Waxman does not see A Shayna Maidel which runs in its Canadian premiere April 20 to May 13 at the North York Performing Arts Centre Studio Theatre, as a Holocaust play. Rather, he says, it is a play of the '90s fraught with family tensions and the timeless struggle of people to carve out their own lives.

One sister and the father have escaped pre-war Europe, and live in New York, but one sister and the mother are caught in the Holocaust and the mother dies. The reunion of the sisters in New York, after the war, and the dramatic aftermath, is at the core of the play by American writer Barbara Lebow, produced here in Toronto by Janese Kane.

The father in A Shayna Maidel, the fulcrum character, is played by well known TV actor Harvey Atkin. The two sisters are played by Shannon Lawson and Sharon Bernbaum. Bernbaum most recently appeared in 32 Short Films about Glenn Gould. Maya Swadron plays the mother.

Waxman is confident that the play will uplift and entertain the audience because it deals with universal themes, and despite its sombre background, has humorous moments.

"I'm tremendously excited about directing a play on stage for the first time in many years. I've been lucky that my TV work, for example in Cagney and Lacey and King of Kensington has been worthwhile, but a lot of TV is just an assembly line process. Directing a play like A Shayna Maidel is what theatre is all about and what I've always wanted to do."

Tickets range in price from $17.50 for students and seniors to $29.50 for evening performances and runs Tuesday-Saturday at 8 p.m., Wednesday and Thursday at 1 p.m. and on Sunday at 2 p.m. For information and group sales, call 924-7392.

Filmmaker comes to terms with grandmother's death

Toronto Jewish Film Festival

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Would you make a film about your grandmother dying? That's what Thank You and Good Night is about.

Jan Oxenberg has made an uncompromisingly honest film about the last days of her grandmother, Mae Joffe, and her own attempts to come to terms with the death. It plays May 4 at 9.30 p.m. at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival at the Bloor Cinema, running time 80 minutes.

Its appeal is in its probing of the family relationships—remember this is real life, the people are not actors. "Bring on the cameras," are among Grandma's last words.

We learn that Oxenberg's own mother, Helen, and her grandmother didn't get along, perhaps because one of Helen's young children was killed in an auto accident, and Helen's marriage broke up. "I don't know what she [Helen] has against me," says Grandma.

Oxenberg uses a cut out cardboard figure of a 5-year-old child named Scowling Jane to narrate and comment on events. (It is the filmmaker.) This works well when Jan is young and close to her grandmother who takes her to see The Pyjama Game and other plays, when Helen is doing errands or at the beauty parlor.

"Why didn't you teach my mother to cook?" Jan asks her grandmother. "Because she was never home long enough," is the reply.

Scowling Jane doesn't work as well when, in fantasy, she explores her grandmother's afterlife in outer space. The purpose of this sequence is unclear.

Typical of its gritty honesty is a scene some time after the funeral when Helen is all dolled up for a date with a man she met at the shivah.

Oxenberg is a brilliant filmmaker with a laser-accurate eye. Her scene of two grandchildren interviewing each other after the funeral (mimicking the trite things which adults say) is a gem. Her brother Ricky's commentary on Grandma Mae's life lifts the film out of the depths.

A slice of life of a different kind is Deaf Heaven, a 30-minute film about a gay man, Paul, who is not infected with AIDs, and his dying lover, and what he learns from Jake, a 75-year-old survivor of Auschwitz playing May 5 at 8.15 p.m.

In this case, actors play the parts, David Opatoshu coming out of retirement to depict Jake. But the story is based on the lives of friends of director Steve Levitt.

The problem with Deaf Heaven is equating AIDS with the Holocaust, though the subject is introduced legitimately, Jake telling Paul that they are both witnesses to events the world does not want to hear about.

But can't understanding and sympathy for an AIDS victim be done in a film that stands on its own, without involving the Holocaust? I've seen many that have done so.

One of Deaf Heaven's weaknesses is that the dying lover, losing his sanity and babbling about events long ago, miraculously recovers long enough to turn down a bid from his homophobic parents to get him to return to their home in Kansas. This is quite a lot for the viewer to swallow, even though the director's friends had recounted a story of a mysterious nurse praying with the gay couple before the victim became sane again.

Another real life drama is the 10-minute film This Unfamiliar Place showing May 2 at 7.15 p.m. in which director Eva Hona Brzeski recounts her attempts to find out from her survivor father what happened to him during the Holocaust. He never does tell her. "I realized how important were the things my father didn't tell me," the director- narrator says. The film's chief appeal is the collection of family snapshots of their life in Poland.

The actual wedding of two Jewish women to each other in Los Angeles is the subject of the 30-minute Chicks in White Satin, an Academy Award nominee for short documentary, playing the festival's opening night, April 28, at 8 p.m.

Again these are the real people, not actors, including the family members.

This controversial film is by Elaine Holliman who has been hired by Hollywood Pictures to make a full-length feature on the same subject. Is this exploitation or is it legitimate drama?

The film shows the love Debra and Heidi have for each other, the acceptance of their daughter's decision by Debra's parents and the final but slow-in-developing acceptance by Heidi's mother. Heidi's father is out of the picture—he didn't respond to requests that he take part in the film.

The couple, Debra and Heidi Stern-Ellis, were married by Rabbi Sue Elwell, and the chupah wedding scene is a remarkable one.

The Molly Picon film East and West will not be shown, and in its place, Tevye a 96-minute film starring Maurice Schwartz, is scheduled for Sunday, May 1 at 2 p.m.

Funny flick looks at the singles scene

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

The Jewish singles scene is the subject of Constance Marks' humorous film, Let's Fall In Love.

Part of an ensemble of short opening night documentaries at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival on April 28, Let's Fall In Love revolves around a singles weekend for 1,200 Jewish men and women at the Concord Hotel in the Catskill Mountains.

We meet a plethora of eminently sane to quirky people — the woman who seeks a mate with "at least a job" and the ability "to put two words together"; the elderly man who's looking for a "bitchy woman," since all others are supposedly dull; the dentist whose mother is after him to get married; the femme fatale with the see-through blouse who makes a date over the phone; the widow who's "forgotten what to do" on such occasions; the woman who demands "a multi-millionaire who's not a shlep."

The camera picks out a variety of prospects — the man who doesn't want to appear "too eager"; the couple who are getting along famously after having met only two hours ago; the ladies in tight skirts waiting to be romanced; the couple smooching on a couch; the guy who lures women with a white French poodle.

Though usually funny, Let's Fall In Love is also somewhat sad. Let's not forget that everyone here is desperately trying to change their marital status. The life of a single person can be rather lonely.

Choir produces cassette

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The golden voices of the synagogue choir and the Zemer Chorale are now available on a well-produced cassette, Music at Beth Emeth, just issued.

The synagogue choir, one of the few still comprising just men and boys, is featured in several of the traditional melodies, along with Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda's famous Cantor Louis Danto.

Music at Beth Emeth is a definitive collection of 17 liturgical, chassidic, Hebrew and Yiddish songs to delight the lover of Jewish music.

Many of the songs are arrangements of traditional Jewish songs that have never been recorded before. They were first published by Beth Emeth Synagogue in an anthology titled A Testament of Song, edited by Charles Heller, director of the choirs. Heller collected and notated the songs from the singing of members of the synagogue who recalled the songs from their family traditions. The book, which has sold around the world, is still available from Beth Emeth Synagogue.

The tape is available from Beth Emeth gift shop, Negev bookstore and Israel's on Clark Avenue.

Correction

In the April 14 issue of The CJN a caption with a picture described a fundraising picnic held at Kew Beach for the new Jewish Folks Home as taking place in the middle of summer of 1993. The described picnic actually took place in 1933. The CJN regrets the error.

Israeli film joins the festival

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Zohar: Mediterranean Blues, the only Israeli offering at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, concerns the rise and fall of Zohar Argov, the soulful, legendary Sephardi singer.

Eran Riklis' moody piece, scheduled to be screened on May 1 at 8:30 p.m., leaves a viewer depressed, if not moved, by Argov's tragic fate.

Argov, whose original surname was Orkaby, was a talented entertainer who squandered it all on drugs. In 1987, at the age of 32, he hanged himself in a prison cell after a courageous but ultimately vain attempt to kick his self-destructive habit.

Largely set in Tel Aviv, where Argov was born and raised, Zohar is basically a biopic, albeit colored by socio-political brushstrokes.

In telling his story, Riklis touches on the underlying tension which affects Sephardi-Ashkenazi relations in Israel. This is most apparent in a scene where the singer's canny manager urges him to change his Sephardi-sounding name to satisfy the whims of the Israeli marketplace.

At its best, Zohar is a film which traces the ascent of a poor Yemenite boy to stardom. Raised in a deprived neighborhood, referred to as the Eastern Quarters, Argov not only had to cope with poverty, but with a father whose drunken state was a source of embarrassment.

Toronto Jewish Film Festival

Zohar opens with the 13-year-old Argov singing Israel's national anthem, Hatikva, in his school auditorium. Before he can finish, his father wobbles in, obviously under the influence of alcohol. Argov runs away, deeply shamed by the spectacle.

The film cuts to the future, after Argov has completed a jail sentence for rape. He wants to rebuild his relationship with his ex-wife, but, having been scarred once too often, she is unwilling to try again.

Her reluctance is well-founded. Although Argov becomes a singing sensation, he gets hooked on hard drugs. His friends and handlers rush to his aid, but he is too far gone for any meaningful help. He falls deep into debt to a rapacious drug dealer, someone with whom he grew up.

Shaul Mizrahi, a skillful actor, portrays Argov. He underplays his role, thereby rendering it more powerful.

Dafna Dekel, a lovely presence, depicts Bracha, his former wife. Gaby Amrany as his manager and Menahem Einy as a composer acquit themselves honorably.

Despite its generally somber tone, Zohar is enlivened by a lilting soundtrack, highlighted by The Flower In My Garden, Argov's greatest hit.

The film is occasionally quite moving and certainly poignant, but it's dogged by a woodenness to which Riklis never finds a solution.

Is There A Doctor In The House?: Chances are, there'll be dozens of physicians at Lifebeat '94, which unfolds at Harbourfront's Premiere Dance Theatre, April 28, 29 and 30 at 8 p.m. This 11th annual musical variety benefit concert features talented health care professionals from Toronto hospitals like Mount Sinai, Women's College, the Toronto Hospital and Sunnybrook. Participants from Mount Sinai are Dr. David White, Dr. Gerald Baker, Dr. Harold Fisher, Dr. Irving Koven, Dr. Pam Morgan, Dr. Beverly Morningstar and nurses Adrienne Desjardins and Genevieve Miller.

Singers, dancers, musicians, barbershoppers and scintillating rhythmics should keep your pulse hopping. Despite the participation of several anesthetists, the entertainment is guaranteed not to put you to sleep. Proceeds go to Fife House, an organization that provides supportive housing for people with AIDS and HIV infection. Tickets for the gala performance on Thursday April 28 are $125; subsequent performances are $17.50 to $25. Premiere Dance Theatre, (416) 973-4000.

Tap-Dancing Into Our Hearts: Now in its 36th season, North York's premier musical theatre company, the Yorkminstrels, is mounting the high-energy Broadway musical 42nd Street, complete with silly 1940s plot, outstanding tap choreography and hummable tunes like You're Getting to Be A Habit With Me, We're In The Money, Shuffle Off to Buffalo and the title piece. Cast members include Carol Kugler, Bonnie Gold and Sandi Horwitz.

42nd Street plays at Cardinal Carter Academy (36 Greenfield Ave., North York) on May 5 (preview); May 6, 7, 12, 13, 14 at 8 p.m.; and May 8 at 2 p.m. Tickets are $8 on preview night, $15 thereafter. Phone the box office, (905) 822-7291, for tickets. Audience members are requested to bring canned goods for donation to a food bank.

Media Watch: This month's cover story in Saturday Night magazine has produced a "phenomenal" response, according to a source at the magazine. The cover blurb reads, "The Real Schindler: The People Who Made Schindler's List Never Knew the Wartime Hero — An Exclusive First-Hand Account from Someone Who Did." The article was written by Herbert Steinhouse in 1949 after he interviewed many of Schindler's Jews and then the enigmatic "Righteous Gentile" himself. The article sat in a drawer, unpublished, for 45 years until the emergence of Steven Spielberg's recent masterpiece. The magazine is reportedly selling so well that Lichtman's and other retailers apparently can't keep it on the shelves.

This month's Ms. Magazine depicts Sigmund Freud as a woman in a cartoon cover drawing captioned "Exclusive From Her New Book: Gloria Steinem Gives Freud A Sex Change — and shrinks his theories down to size."

Writing in The Forward, critic Masha Leon gives glowing praise to Ivan and Abraham, a new film (with English subtitles) by Paris-born filmmaker Yolande Zauberman. Leon admits she saw the movie four times. "So evocative and authentic was the experience (of seeing this film) that I wished, in Star Trek fashion, to be beamed back to the still intact shtetl on the Belarussian-Polish border where the film was shot .... Zauberman has created a masterpiece, a classic for all time, filled with the hope that all Ivans and Abrahams will be able to live together in peace."

Vibrant images of pre-war Poland in Koffler exhibition

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Three generations of a Jewish family are squeezed around a seder table with a ghostly Elijah at the door. A youth in a school uniform stands on a street, clutching a store-bought herring.

These and other images of pre-war Polish Jewish life go on view this week in a remarkable debut exhibition of paintings by Mayer Kirshenblatt at the Koffler Gallery, 4588 Bathurst St.

Kirshenblatt's vivid, primitivist "memory paintings" deal with the impoverished townsfolk of his hometown of Opatow. He left Opatow in 1934 at 17, long before Germany's Final Solution would eradicate most of the townsfolk and three million of their co-religionists across Poland.

Asked for an adjective to describe his own art, Kirshenblatt — a retired paint and wallpaper merchant who took up the painter's easel only four years ago — wastes no time. "Innocent."

Spry at 78

At 78, he appears at least a decade younger, a spry, ruddy-cheeked, mustachioed man with flecks of paint on his fingers. (Those same hands crafted a collection of Jewish folk toys that have twice been exhibited in the Smithsonian Institute in Washington, D.C.) Almost daily, he goes to the JCC Health Club, where most of his friends are concentration camp survivors.

"We sit down, we talk, and no matter what subject we start with, within five minutes we're talking about the concentration camp.

"I certainly do not wish to minimize or diminish the experience of Holocaust survivors, but they talk as though there was no life in Poland before the war. I say there was a life in Poland before the war, a very rich cultural life."

A group of boys in cheder; a washer-woman cleaning clothes; townsfolk gathered around a well to draw water; adults holding live chickens overhead in the pre-Yom Kippur ceremony of Kapores; a funeral procession entering the Jewish cemetery, chock-a-block full of stones — canvas after canvas reflects magical, richly detailed moments, depicted boldly through the overgrown memory of childhood.

Kirshenblatt has a keen eye and the makings of a raconteur. Each one of his paintings contains a story, and he seems to relish its telling. For the benefit of those who inspect his paintings without his narration, small cards beside each painting offer explanations of relevant folklore.

In one painting appears a boy in a white shroud. Since his parents had lost several sons before him, the rabbi told them to dress the boy in a shroud to trick the angel of death into believing he had already died. In another, a woman wears a brazen red dress. The card explains her occupation.

Naive and nostalgic, Kirshenblatt's canvases illustrate a lost world. He says he would rather keep them than sell them; one day he hopes to donate them to a major Jewish institution.

"The purpose of the paintings is to perpetuate the memory of Jewish life in the small towns of Poland," he says. "For someone to take one of them and hang it in his room, where no one else would see it, wouldn't be fulfilling the purpose. That's not what I want."

Mayer Kirshenblatt's Folk Paintings of Jewish Life in Poland, 1920-1934, opens April 20 and runs to June 1. The artist gives a talk at the Koffler Gallery, Sunday, May 15 at 2 p.m.

Immigrants' art in exhibit

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Immigrants are known to represent a large, sometimes untapped pool of talent and skills.

That extends, it seems, to the world of fine art.

Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) in Toronto, which helps newcomers with finances, accomodations, employment and other settlement aid, was determined to show the Jewish community that artistic talent exists, even thrives, in the emigre population.

The result is a first: an exhibit showcasing works solely by Jewish Canadian immigrants.

JIAS, working with the Koffler Gallery, has amassed an impressive collection of 40-odd pieces, winnowed from over 100 submitted. The quick response surprised even JIAS and gallery officials, who confess to being overwhelmed by both the quantity and quality of the works.

The idea, says Jacqueline Kott of JIAS, was to remind the community of the importance of immigration and the vibrant Jewish life immigrants bring with them.

As one might expect, many pieces explore the immigrant experience. Some are bright and cheery reflections of the artist's origins; others are gloomy and morose, as if the creator accepts his new home but still pines for his homeland, or speaks woefully of his land's anti-Semitism.

Biblical and concentration camp themes are present throughout, as many artists are Holocaust survivors.

Media of all kind are employed: oil, acrylic, watercolor, silk, glass, lithography, photographs and woodcutting.

Birthplaces represented in the show are many. The Soviet Union and Russia are predominant, but there are artists from Morocco, South Africa, Israel, Egypt, Belgium, eastern Europe and the United States.

An international flavor is unmistakable, as is the perspective of time. Submissions range from artists who immigrated here as early as 1938, right up to a few months ago.

Most of the art is for sale. Prices begin at under $100, with 10 per cent of proceeds going to JIAS.

The exhibit runs to May 1. There will be a meet-the-artists reception at the Koffler Gallery April 23 at 8 p.m.

Books

By BERNARD BASKIN

Bone To The Bone by Nathan Shaham, Grove Press $22 (US)

Avigdor Barkov, the protagonist of Shaham's penetrating novel, is an idealist who is ultimately defeated by his ideology. He is a Marxist, convinced Soviet Russia is the brave new world of the future. His undeviating faith in Communism transcends his concern for his children and the two women he loved and who gave birth to them.

Born in Russia, Barkov comes of age about the time of the revolution. Vigorous and protean, he works as a miner, printer, road builder, farmhand, shepherd, cowboy and lumberjack. Inspired by his Zionist father, an Orthodox Talmudist, he leaves his native Ukraine for Palestine where he finds work as a pioneer in the Labour Brigade and strives to spread his Marxist ideas.

Conflicted by what he comes to regard as the narrow goals of Jewish nationalism against the heady dreams of international communism, Barkov returns to the Soviet Union. There, ironically, he is found to be politically unorthodox and imprisoned for most of the Stalinist era.

The author, a lifelong kibbutznik, is well-known for his previous novels, The Other Side of the Wall and the prize-winning The Rosendorf Quarter. He takes us into the mind of Barkov, who at 70 comes back to Israel to pick up the tangled threads of his past.

Through a number of notebooks Barkov recounts the major events of his life in a brisk, somewhat offhand manner. He remains surprisingly unbitter — unwilling to condemn his erstwhile Soviet enemies or to extol the virtues of Israel. For him, life is no longer a matter of extremes, but suffused with ambiguity and shades of grey.

Trying to forge new ties with his children and grandchildren Barkov also struggles to find some moral imperative he can cling to, perhaps some form of religious faith. He asserts "all my life I have maintained that He does not exist and behaved as if He does. And all too often I meet people who say that He exists and behave as if He doesn't."

Shaham has brilliantly brought to life a man of our times, an idealist-survivor who gradually finds his way to new purpose and meaning as a person and Jew.

Device locates acupoints and helps to relieve pain

For thousands of years mankind has mysteriously turned to acupuncture to relieve a wide variety of painful conditions. Today, modern science has unravelled the mystery and determined that endorphins, the internal morphines our own bodies produce, are the main reasons why acupuncture relieves pain so well.

Now the days of suffering from debilitating headaches and migraines, arthritic disorders, low back pain, fibromyalgia or a host of other painful ailments could be over, with a new product that offers the benefits of acupuncture without needles.

Developed by Dr. Dean Richards, a medical doctor and acupuncturist, the Acuhealth "acupuncture" TENS is a portable self-help device that quickly treats pain anywhere or anytime.

Based on the same principles as acupuncture, the hand-held battery operated device electronically locates acupoints precisely and accurately. Once the acupoint is located, a safe, low frequency electrical impulse is delivered to trigger the release of the body's opiate-like hormones (endorphins), thereby giving the user extended relief from pain. Treatment is non-invasive, non-addictive and, as with acupuncture, very versatile.

A manual and instructional video are provided to help patients or caregivers locate the correct series of points for different painful conditions.

The Acuhealth unit has prescription status as a TENS device for reimbursement under private health insurance, Workers' Compensation and Veterans Affairs Canada. DVA TAPS cards are accepted. For more information, call 1-800-567-7246.

A Friend InDeed

A Friend InDeed has been operating for two years, with the aim of improving seniors' quality of life through personal attention and care. The idea came to owner Judy Smith through selling real estate, where she met many older people living in houses they could no longer maintain.

One-on-one contact is emphasized, though group activities like parties are also possible. One major service is to offer surrogate children. A care giver will call or visit an elderly person whose grown-up children live out of town, are on holidays, or are over-occupied, often with their own family. Especially once they are in hospitals or old-age homes, many seniors do not get the touching or family contact they need. Besides making contact between seniors and their families and the care givers, Smith also maintains liaison with social agencies.

Clients tend to be between 80 and 90 years old, some in the pre-hospital stages of Alzheimer's disease. Care givers tend to be about 50; they must be sensitive and caring, young enough to be healthy and active, but with experience and maturity. They spend about three afternoons a week with any client.

A Friend InDeed can give you peace of mind.

Forest Hill Place expands its continuum of care

With the recent development of an Assisted Daily Living floor, Forest Hill Place now offers a complete continuum of care. The continuum's three levels of care are all available in a luxurious environment in the heart of the Forest Hill community.

Forest Hill Link provides independent seniors with the serenity and convenience of a full-service retirement residence while living in a private apartment. Residents of the Link prepare their own meals, but they may also purchase meals in Forest Hill's elegant dining room. Housekeeping is performed weekly and residents are welcome to enjoy the facilities and activities at the full-service retirement residence situated adjacent to the Link.

Forest Hill Place's full-service retirement residence accommodates residents with the independence of a private suite furnished with the residents' own furniture and belongings. Residents are provided with a choice menu of delicious home cooked meals, daily housekeeping and a wide range of recreational activities. With 24-hour nursing supervision, residents also receive management of their personal medication and weekly assistance with bathing.

Forest Hill Place's Assisted Daily Living (ADL) staff assist seniors who have greater health care needs. ADL has 29 secured suites to ensure the safety of residents who may be prone to wandering. In addition to the services included in the full-service program, ADL offers room service breakfast, assistance with bathing, dressing, ambulation, personal laundry and specialized activities. Short-term respite stays are also available.

Other features in Forest Hill's retirement community include:

- an urgent call communication system in each suite
- medical staff on duty 24 hours a day and a house doctor always on call
- individual heating and air conditioning controls
- state-of-the-art smoke detectors and sprinkler systems
- library, beauty/barber shop, exercise room, baking centre, billiard and craft rooms, and weekly in-house banking

Forest Hill Place is actively involved with numerous Jewish organizations and regularly hosts stimulating lectures and special events open to the community.

Conveniently located near shopping, places of worship, public libraries, neighborhood parks, hospitals, and public transportation, Forest Hill Place is ideally situated on the corner of Bathurst and Castlefield Avenue.

The community is invited to visit for lunch and a tour to see first hand all of the services included in one monthly fee. For further details about Forest Hill Place, please call Marlene White at 785-1511.

Firm offers seniors' programs

Since opening in 1975, Senior Citizens Tour and Travel has become Ontario's largest operator of worldwide escorted tours. President Danny Shay ascribes this growth to repeat business based on a high level of satisfaction, and referrals based on recommendations by clients.

The clients tend to be fun-loving and sociable; they enjoy their holidays and the people they meet on them. Some of them make lasting friendships and continue to travel together.

Over the course of the year, the traveller can choose from nearly 100 tour programs worldwide; nobody else offers more. The tours are more leisurely than the average. On multi-stop programs, the stopovers are at least two days long. On the "stay put" holidays, the traveller settles into one or two hotels for the duration of the tour. The agency arranges sightseeing and entertainment, but leaves plenty of time open for exploring, shopping or relaxation.

Often, the nitty-gritty of reservations, timetables, baggage handling or transportation can make a holiday seem too much like work. Senior Citizens tour planners not only arrange these matters in advance, so the traveller can stay carefree. They also inspect or research each hotel on every tour. As a result, the level of hotel service is consistently high.

On tour, the Tour Escorts handle the details of tipping hotel and restaurant staff, checking in and out, and generally making sure things run smoothly. Most meals are pre-arranged; on most tours, breakfast and dinner, and in some cases even lunch, are included in the price (which also covers tipping). Sightseeing and excursions, and tips for tour guides and bus drivers, are also included in the tour price.

In most Ontario cities and towns, the traveller is picked up at home at the beginning of the tour, and driven back home at the end of the holiday.

Escorts are there to make sure the tour is full of fun, and runs smoothly; they also have to be able to handle any emergency. They are chosen both for their caring nature and their competence in dealing with any eventuality.

Last but not least, there is no "fine print"; the price of the Senior Citizens Tour covers all costs. This includes health and cancellation insurance, airport and other taxes including GST, baggage handling, home pick-up service, and all tipping. Reasonable as Senior Citizens Tour and Travel prices are, they cover a high value.

Firm offers long term health care insurance

Let us be blunt. As horrible as it sounds, there are two ways to die, quickly or slowly. To die slowly is very expensive. Fortunately, the financial burden can be handled in advance, through a long term insurance policy which lets you plan your future health care.

With age, the probability increases that you or someone you love will need long term care. A 1990 estimate showed people aged 65 face a 43 percent chance of entering a long term facility, while 21 percent of people 65 or over who required long term care were in nursing homes.

Many people think the government will provide less and less health care in the future. Now, for the first time in Canada, seniors can meet this risk with an insurance policy for ages 50 through 80, and backed by the government through Compcorp.

Consider the alternatives. Ward care costs $30 per day, over and above government subsidies, or $900 per month. Government budget cuts mean that getting into a public nursing home at the same cost may mean waiting for years. Private nursing homes admit you at once, but at great expense. Semi-private or private room care may cost up to $2,400 monthly. Care at $75 per day amounts to over $27,000 per year after tax, or $40,000 taxable income—a huge burden for you or your spouse.

Long term care insurance enables you to pay for quality care without waiting. The income paid out is tax-free; when on claim, the plan pays up to $3,000 monthly. Benefits may last your entire lifetime or less, and be paid direct to you or the nursing home of your choice.

Anyone in a nursing home, on kidney dialysis or inhalation therapy, needing a mechanical device to breathe, or unable to perform normal daily activities like bathing, dressing, eating, toileting or walking indoors is not eligible. The plan is available to seniors of average health for their age, the ailments, aches and pains all seniors get.

Premiums can be as low as $10 per month. For the average 65-year-old, a $1,200 monthly benefit costs from $27.73 to $59.36 a month ($59.36 for a lifetime benefit). You are covered 24 hours a day with no waiting, and pay no premiums while receiving a claim. The plan covers recurrent confinements, convalescent and skilled nursing, a convalescent hospital or unit, and custodial and intermediate care.

There is a good chance that you or a loved one will need long term care. Remember: only those who do not need insurance right now, can buy it. Call United National Insurance Services now, at 1-800-661-3400.

Weight Winners offers an anti-diet program

How often have you heard that diets don't work? Fortunately, Weight-Winners offers a non-diet approach to the age-old problem of losing weight.

"Rather than handing out a list of forbidden foods, Weight-Winners teaches people eating strategies and how to separate their feelings from food," says administrator Carol Mark. "They learn to listen to internal cues and eat when they are hungry, rather than listening to external cues which will cause them to eat when they think they should.

Steady and consistent weight loss has resulted from this program: up to 18 pounds during the program, and continued loss following termination, as a result of significant behavioral and attitude change.

The Weight-Winners Mind-Body Program is run by registered psychologists so it may be covered by a private insurance plan.

The eight two to three-hour weekly sessions are geared towards adolescents and adults. Topics covered during the sessions include dismantling diets; learning eating control strategies and eating style of naturally thin people; attitudinal change and visualization; emotional restructuring — separating eating and feelings; exercise and nutrition education.

For information, and free introductory talk, call (416) 469-9622.

"Diets don't work!"

So, you think you know everything about weight loss? Try this simple quiz.

a	I feel guilty when I eat		d	I eat when I am bored
b	I have famine and feast cycles		e	I lose control around food
c	I eat when I am upset		f	I always think about food

Take control now!

★ Learn to eat only when you're hungry
★ Stop when you're satisfied
★ Understand your body needs
★ Learn to deal with emotions positively

Weight Winners is an anti-diet program that really works in the long term.

Eight week program covers eating behaviour modification, emotional change, attitudinal change, nutritional information and physical change

Experience shows but it doesn't have to

Environmental and genetic aging faces a formidable enemy in the well-informed baby boom generation. This group has shifted its emphasis away from radical surgery to a preventive, natural approach to skin treatment. Dr. John Goldhar, director of Toronto's Facial Rejuvenation Centre, adheres to and promotes the new approach.

Dr. Goldhar, head of Dermatology at Mount Sinai Hospital, received his Canadian fellowship and diploma from the American Board of Dermatology in 1977. His staff includes Drs. Anne Curtis and Sandra Landolt, both with degrees in Dermatology and Internal Medicine, and Dr. Dalal Assaad, dermatologist and dermopathologist, renowned for her work in pigmented lesions. The medical staff directs the Centre's cosmetic aestheticians, Suzanne Hay and Kella DiMiglio.

Face peels using light fruit extracts reduce pore size in sun-damaged skin, remove or diminish fine lines and "liver spots", and give skin a radiant, youthful glow. The Centre's new Krypton laser removes facial blood vessels (as well as "liver spots") without the disturbing bruising which other lasers produce. Clients can benefit from Dr. Goldhar's ten years' experience with collagen replacement, using fine-line collagen to help eliminate frown lines, crows' feet around the eyes, and annoying lipstick bleeding lines around the mouth. With summer approaching, the Centre is also seeing increased demand for sclerotherapy--performed by physicians--to eliminate unsightly leg veins.

For more information regarding the the Facial Rejuvenation Centre, call 916-0312.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

Travel & Leisure Show: Roughly 400 exhibitors, including tourist boards, tour operators, airline representatives and travel specialists, display their wares at the eighth annual Travel & Leisure Show this weekend at the International Centre, 6900 Airport Rd., Mississauga.

Numerous speakers include Isobel Warren, an expert on discount travel, and Dr. Mark Wise of Thornhill, who shares principles of travel medicine in a talk entitled Keeping Fit On The Road.

The show opens Friday April 22 and closes Sunday April 24. Phone (416) 360-5514 for hours. Adult admission is $7.

Channel Tunnel Opens: Many millennia ago, Britain was connected to the European continent but drifted away. As of May 6, it is set to be officially rejoined when the Channel Tunnel opens. With terminals at Folkestone and Calais, Le Shuttle, a vehicle-carrying train service, is expected to run up to four times hourly, 24 hours a day, 365 days per year. Passage across the channel takes 35 minutes; transfer from French to English motorways, just over an hour. Fifty kilometres long, the so-called Chunnel lies between 25 to 45 metres below the seabed and costs $444 and up per vehicle (no matter the number of passengers) to traverse. Foot passenger service between London, Paris and Brussels will not begin until mid-1994.

The Pilgrim's Progress: Since time immemorial, Jews have been waiting for the Messiah. This year, in addition, "Israel Waits for the Pope." That's the banner headline on a recent Message From The Holy Land newsletter distributed by the Israel Government Tourist Office in Canada.

As the accompanying article explains, Israel is preparing for the first visit of a Pope in 30 years. Peripatetic John Paul II, who landed at Downsview Airport in the mid-1980s and has kissed the tarmac of airports in many other nations, is finally due to reach Israel in May. The Vatican was even more tardy in establishing diplomatic relations with Israel, extending its belated gesture of friendship to the (then) 45-year-old Jewish state only recently.

Shaare Zedek Mission: Shaare Zedek Medical Centre's Heart to Heart mission to Jerusalem leaves from Toronto May 19, from Montreal May 22. It is scheduled to coincide with the dedication and opening of the hospital's Comprehensive Heart Institute, Israel's first such facility.

The mission includes special sessions with Israeli and international dignitaries and many other special events. For further details, contact Sheila Dropkin at the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation at (416) 781-3584 or 1-800-387-3595.

Overnight Bus to New York Area: Alexander Farber, a Russian-Jewish immigrant living in the Toronto area, has established a reliable and economical means of getting to and from New York City. His company, Tourist Coach Line Inc., operates a 49-passenger motorcoach which completes the return trip for $110 per person ($60 one way), inclusive of all taxes and tolls. The bus leaves every Thursday night after picking up passengers in the Bathurst-Cedarcroft area and Lawrence Plaza. Scheduled stops are Flatbush, Boro Park, Brighton (south Brooklyn near Coney Island) as well as Monsey if enough people request it. For reservations, contact Hymie Lebowitz at Tayar Travel (416) 631-9000 or Lydia at Vacation Enterprises (416) 781-4613.

Exhibit is more than kids' play

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — An exhibition of children's art entitled Through the Eyes of the Child: A Journey to Paradise will be presented by the Avenue Road Arts School, located at 460 Avenue Rd. south of St. Clair Avenue, from April 24 to May 1.

The exhibition is open to the public weekends from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. and weekdays from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. and 7 p.m. to 9 p.m.

The school is located in a turn-of-the-century mansion, the site of the former Royal Conservatory of Music.

The school provides classes in visual art, music, drama and writing for children and adults. School founder and director Lola Rasminsky said she believes children's art is in no way "lesser" than adult art. Her goal is to nurture the creative spirit.

"Children have their own inner vision which must be respected and cultivated at all times," Rasminsky said. "In many ways, the future of the art world depends upon what we teach our children."

Rasminsky, who has worked with children for more than 29 years, believes most adults fail to recognize the enormous richness and brilliance of the inner life of children.

"We are amazed by what they can produce when they are allowed to express themselves fully in a supportive and stimulating environment. Journey to Paradise celebrates the child's vision in a way that we hope will ignite the imagination in all of us — children and adults alike."

She quoted Einstein, who said knowledge is important, but nothing is more important than the imagination.

The children's exhibit has seven themes: The Outdoor Garden, A Portrait Gallery, Mythical Waters, Mad Hatter's Tea Party, A Feast of Beasts, An Anthropological Museum and An Indoor Paradise. The entire school has been transformed into an art gallery.

Putting the finishing touches on a papier mache dragon for the Feast of Beasts which is part of the children's exhibition are (from left) Rae Retchman, Alessandra Reisman and Ali Silverberg.

Instructor Anne West is curator of the show. West said often the only place children's art is displayed is on refrigerators or the kitchen wall.

"Yet, we have found over the years that there is a keen desire among many to view and understand the fresh, intuitive creations of children."

She said that need comes from our mass-media dominated culture. "The images made by children have come to stand as a paradigm for the free and spontaneous in art. Their makings evoke a sense of an unspoiled Eden."

Rasminsky, who founded the creative arts centre and art school in 1979, worked as a music teacher and produced a recording of French songs for children. She frequently gives workshops to early childhood educators and is currently president of The Canadian Society for Advancement of Gifted Education, a charitable organization.

A Cool Deal

ISRAEL — Electra Consumer Products has acquired the French-based L'Air Conditionne, the largest domestic air conditioning manufacturer in Europe, for $15 million, says Elco chairman Gershon Zalkind.

Elco is the parent company of the Electra Group.

Electra has re-named the French company L'Air Conditionne - Electra. The company has a 40,000 square meter factory and 410 workers.

L'Air Conditionne is known in Europe under the Airwell brand name. The company reached its peak in 1990, when it had sales of $178 million. Last year, sales fell to $83 million.

Last October, Electra purchased Spanish-based Johnson, a company engaged mainly in marketing, and about one month ago the company established a marketing firm in Italy called Electra Consumer Products - Italy.

Bank Officials Get Jail

JERUSALEM — Israel's leading banks, along with more than a dozen of their top officials, were given large fines and executives were sentenced to prison on charges relating to what had been Israel's biggest financial scandal ever.

In the ruling, the Jerusalem District Court rendered guilty verdicts against Bank Leumi, Bank Hapoalim and the Discount and Mizrahi Banks in what was seen as the culmination of the scandal surrounding the bank share collapse of 1983.

The court ruled that the bank officials had artificially inflated the price of bank shares, risking the bank's capital and their ability to meet their obligations.

The court fined the four banks some $330,000 apiece. In addition, the court imposed fines as high as $200,000, and in some cases, prison terms of as much as eight months on the executives. The court allowed time for appeals before implementation of the sentences.

Although none of those found guilty are active today in bank management, some are managers of investment companies and the court ruling may bar them from these positions.

Successful Information Program

OTTAWA — The Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada (PMAC) public information campaign has received an overwhelming response from the public and health care professionals.

Over 20,000 Canadians have called the Knowledge is the Best Medicine information line (1-800-363-0203) since the campaign began two months ago. More than 3,500 health professionals have called ordering 231,175 information kits for their patients and clients.

Launched Jan. 17, the campaign consists of a television advertisement that shows a man crossing the street while wearing a blindfold. It makes the point that taking medicines without having all the facts is as irresponsible and dangerous as crossing a busy street blindfolded.

The ad urges Canadians to call the toll-free number for an information package. In it are booklets on how to take medicines safely and effectively, how to talk to your pharmacist about your medications and tips on healthy living. It also includes a personal medication record that should be filled out and shown to your doctor or pharmacist.

Brisk Real Estate Activity

TORONTO — Real estate activity was brisk throughout the month of March, report members of the Toronto Real Estate Board (TREB).

There were 6,008 sales of single-family dwellings which is up 81 per cent over the March 1993 3,323 sales, says president Dorothy Roberts.

"TREB day-to-day sales figures ran at an encouraging pace of roughly 260 per day during March. This strong activity can be attributed to a number of factors — increased affordability, strengthened consumer confidence, and most importantly, the rise in mortgage rates which has hurried some purchasers' decisions about buying a home," Roberts says.

TREB's 6,008 single-family dwelling sales, which were reported throughout Greater Toronto, totalled $1,231,358,608 and averaged $204,953. The median price was $180,000.

A Magic Carpet Ride?

ISRAEL — Evergreen Canada-Israel Investments is helping to get a troubled carpet firm off the ground again.

Evergreen and the textile concern E. Wardinon are purchasing Carmel Carpets, once owned by Knesset member Avraham Shapira. The total purchase price is close to $17 million (US), with Evergreen providing most of the financing and E. Wardinon operating the plants.

However, what remains to be resolved are Carmel's combined debts to the government and a number of banks, estimated to exceed $200 million.

Best Business Forum for Canadian Participation

TORONTO — Israel's Economic Consul in Toronto, Ben Noy, reports a record Canadian contingent at Israel's Fourth Business Forum, recently held in Jerusalem. There were 30 Canadian representatives there.

Some of the Canadian participants returned with innovative investment possibilities. Toronto's Max Peters was impressed with a new system that transforms recyclable waste into building materials. Ted Belman, also from Toronto, discovered a process to bypass X-ray film. Instead, the X-rays would appear directly on a computer screen, where they could easily be available by modem to other experts.

About $45 million in business transactions took place at the Forum.

Israel Bank Controversy Familiar to Canadians

ISRAEL — A few years ago, many segments of the Canadian financial world were up in arms when banks were permitted to branch out into other financial services. Now a similar storm is underway in Israel.

Israeli insurance companies are protesting growing involvement by the banks in their business. Israel's insurance agents' association warned that banks have little expertise in the field. The banking industry responded by accusing insurance agents of simply fearing competition.

However, Dan Tichon, the Knesset's state control committee chair, supports banks selling insurance, as long as they are regulated.

Recent insurance sector profit figures will hardly bolster its side of the argument. Profits on basic insurance came to $76.9 million (US) for the first nine months of last year, but insurance firms expect much less rosy results for the last quarter. They cite more auto thefts and increasing car insurance competition for their pessimistic prediction.

Job Fears Follow Import Figures

ISRAEL — Israel's affinity for foreign clothing has triggered dire unemployment predictions from an official with the country's Manufacturers' Association.

Mordechai Baron forecast up to 20,000 job losses over the next 10 years because of rising imports and stiffer competition.

Last year, Israel imported $183 million worth of clothing, which accounts for 15 per cent of the local market. That's a 70 per cent increase over 1992.

The import problem, particularly from third world countries, may be unavoidable because of lower production costs and reduced Israeli tariffs.

Minister is in a Hurry for Hotels

ISRAEL — Israel's Tourism Minister Uzi Baram is unhappy with the pace of hotel construction.

Baram has already submitted a proposal to Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin to speed up the hotel building permit process. Now, he's asking Rabin to implement his recommendations.

New tourism records were set last year as two million visitors landed at Ben Gurion airport. Israeli tourism revenue amounts to about $2.6 billion a year.

In Canada, Christian pilgrimages, which are expected to be bolstered by the Pope's upcoming visit to Israel, represent a quickly expanding tourism market.

Partners move fast to set up new business

By STEPHANIE CHAPMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's possible that the management staff at the Linero factory, located on Kibbutz Hasolelim, didn't know what hit them.

Motty Weinstock, a Toronto accountant, enthusiastically approached Linero about exporting their drawing and measuring equipment and display systems to Canada.

Two months later, this business partnership is a done deal and the speed with which it was formed is astounding.

The general manager of Linero, Israel Visel, was in Toronto to help Weinstock represent the company at the recent Canada's Office Products Show.

Perhaps there is nothing more logical than an accountant — who has maintained strong ties to Israel since moving to Canada 18 years ago — following up on a small article he read in an Israeli newspaper. However, one question comes to mind. What was it about this firm that spurred such action?

Sitting in his display booth on the last day of the show, Weinstock proudly demonstrated some of the office equipment, pointing out the innovative differences that make Linero products superior to those already on the market.

For example, the ruler is not just a ruler. Adding a strip of rubber along the edge means that it will not slip off the drawing board. Such a simple thing but one that makes the product practical, Weinstock says.

Talking over one another in a good-hearted fashion, Weinstock and Visel relate some of the business factors they believe will help this enterprise succeed.

To begin with, although some Linero products are already being sold in Canada, none of the import/export firms are selling the pieces under the Linero name.

Using what Weinstock called his "Israeli chutzpah" he printed the business cards and literature with the Linero name prior to obtaining permission from the head office.

He was convinced that this would be a selling point in the Canadian market, as potential clients would realize the middle man had been eliminated.

Visel nods his head in agreement adding that in the business world, the previous negativity surrounding products made in Israel has almost disappeared. Today, there is no reason to hide an Israeli name behind that of another, he says.

Weinstock says his plan is to do it big. So far, the partnership is off and running and both men agree that the trust between the two parties could not be greater.

"This relationship is more than just buying and selling. It includes an exchange of business plans and ideas," Weinstock says.

One major barrier facing Linero is the fact that computers have replaced much of the manual office equipment.

Given this fact, what does the future hold?

Visel says that many businesses who hail from the traditional drawing and measuring equipment markets left a huge vaccum when they moved to the computer industry. Linero is already beginning to fill the void.

In order to expand their markets, Linero manufactures pieces that are suitable for back-to-school and educational tools including Hebrew letters.

Two years ago, Linero spotted the trend that would see a move towards computers and they took steps to ensure their future. Linero expanded its business to incorporate display systems that can be used for corporate events, mall kiosks and much more.

The newest item manufactured at Linero is the illuminated board. One model called Lightwrite uses the latest optical technology and enables the client to create eye-catching, colorful messages. A second model, Lightchild is a portable illuminated erasable drawing board for children.

Weinstock is sure these will be top sellers in the Canadian market. His experience in founding and operating an office equipment business originates with the work he did for Star Quality Office Furniture Manufacturing Ltd. in Concord, a firm owned by his brother-in-law. Weinstock has also opened his 1,500-square-foot office in Concord.

The Linero factory was founded in 1971 and is the largest manufacturer of drawing and measuring equipment in Israel. To date, Linero exports products to the European Common Market countries, the United Kingdom, the Phillipines, Thailand, Hong Kong, Japan, the United States, and now, Canada.

Lightchild is an illuminated drawing board for children.

Tips From Pros

There is perhaps nothing so daunting to the average person as the idea of investing in the stock market.

Many investors are confused by the symbols and legends in the newspapers' stock tables, believing ancient Greek would be easier to understand.

And if the language of the stock market is not confusing enough, there are the memories and reminders of crashes, both recent and in the past. In 1929, the world watched helplessly as Wall Street crashed and life savings were lost. The same scenario was repeated more recently, when, on a Monday in October, 1987, the stock markets tumbled, leaving many wondering what had happened to their 'sure-thing' investments.

They were victims of stock market volatility, of the instability of the market. No market goes up or down forever. It merely responds to such influences as changes in the world's political climate.

Many who lost money in the 1987 crash purchased their stock in the height of the market, hoping to realize returns far greater than those available from more conservative investments, such as term deposits and guaranteed investment certificates. When the crash hit they sold what they had for whatever they could get, vowing never to cross that threshold into the stock world again.

These investors lacked two things which are essential to successful investing in the stock market, either directly or through mutual funds. These are patience and discipline. Those investors who held their ground and stayed with the stock market found the market recovered most of its losses within a year. Some investors found the depressed market too attractive to let pass, buying shares and equity mutual funds at deflated values and earned returns of as much as 20 per cent.

Despite the market's ability to recover, many still feel stocks are too speculative. If you compare stocks to Treasury bills (T-bills) and bonds, stocks are perceived to be risky because their volatility over the short term is higher relative to T-bills and bonds.

In the short term, stocks can earn more or less than cash deposits. One cannot predict how successful an investment will be, but over the long term, stocks of quality companies become much less risky. Research shows that during periods of five or 10 years, stocks have outperformed T-bills and bonds. This indicates that an investor's potential return on stocks will exceed the potential return on bonds and T-bills; provided the investor holds the stock for at least five years.

If you're prepared to invest for the long term, you might be tempted to run out and set up a stock portfolio of your own. However, chances are keeping track of a stock portfolio and the stock market would mean dropping everything to manage it properly. In that case, you're better choice is mutual funds. They are professionally-managed, offer a variety of choices to each investor and they work.

Over the long term, well-managed equity funds have outperformed more conservative investment vehicles such as T-bills and guaranteed investment certificates.

See a professional financial adviser to learn how you can take the sting out of the stock market with mutual funds.

Honoring women who make a difference

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Women who want to achieve must never stop learning, according to Sonja Bata, a director of Bata Ltd., a company that manufactures shoes in 60 countries worldwide.

She said after marrying Thomas J. Bata in 1946, she discovered just how crucial knowledge was, as she pitched in to help rebuild the Bata family shoe business, which was lost after the Communist takeover in Czechoslovakia.

Bata spoke at the sixth annual Women Who Make A Difference awards evening hosted by Toronto Life Fashion and the Hudson's Bay Company. The $60 a ticket event drew more than 400 people to a reception and presentation at The Bay's Queen Street store. Proceeds go to the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation.

Having studied architecture, Bata said she thought working with company's designers was a logical starting point for her first year in the business. However, when she did visit shoe factories, she found employees, who always greeted her with a bouquet of flowers, listened to her politely but without a great deal of enthusiasm. "Not much action took place," she recalled.

Bata responded to the rebuff by building up her qualifications. She worked as a salesperson and a store manager and took courses in shoe design. "Over the years I established myself as a person who has some knowledge," she said.

Acknowledging that she is a team player, she stressed she never found being a woman a disadvantage.

For Bata, sitting on boards of various organizations is an opportunity to learn. Her network of contacts has grown along with her accomplishments. "The more you accomplish, the more likely you are to be asked to do even more," she said.

The recipe for achievement, she told the mainly female audience, includes risk-taking, curiosity, sheer determination, vision and an unshakable conviction that one will succeed.

Seven Toronto women were recognized at the 1994 Women Who Make a Difference awards ceremony. Well-known comedian and actress Andrea Martin provided entertainment and made introductions.

The winner in the business professional category was Linda Haynes, president of ACE Bakery. She donates a third of the bakery's profits to a registered charitable organization that provides access to credit for low income, self-employed people in Canada and abroad.

Diane Longboat, the president of First Nations House at the University of Toronto, won for her involvement in community affairs. She started First Nations House to address the needs of Native students on campus.

Zena Kossar, the founder and CEO of the Metro Toronto International Caravan, won in the entrepreneurial category. The award for media went to Pamela Wallin, the co-host of CBC TV's Prime Time News. Comedian and actress Sandra Shamas received the performing arts award.

Helen Gurney, the winner in the sport category, started out as a physical education teacher in 1940. She has spent her life championing the rights of women to participate in sports. Gurney built a network of teams and leagues in Windsor, turning the city into a showcase for women's athletics in Ontario at a time when school boards in Toronto prohibited inter-scholastic sports for girls. She was instrumental in the development of provincial competitions for girls through the Ontario Federation of School Athletic Associations, and helped to create a national women's network through the Canadian Association of Health, Physical Education and Recreation.

The award for visual arts went to Janet Rosenberg, an architect who has designed projects for Cineplex Odeon Corporation, Co-operative Housing Federation of Toronto, Loblaws Supermarkets Ltd., Exhibition Place, IBM and Novotel Hotel.

PharmaPhone brings ordering and receiving drugs into the computer age.

Introducing: the first PharmaPhone

TORONTO — On March 16, residents of Paquetville, N.B., became the first in the world to order their prescription drugs from a pharmacist miles away, and have them delivered to their front door by courier.

PharmaPhone, the world's first interactive pharmacy, was developed by Meditrust Pharmacy Inc., Northern Telecom, and The Bulldog Group Inc., a communications marketing firm.

Meditrust expects to have a number of PharmaPhones across the country within the year.

PharmaPhone uses Northern Telecom's revolutionary VISIT technology, which allows on-screen conferencing and document exchange.

"PharmaPhone proves that highly-advanced communications technology can actually improve the quality and speed of customer service," said Bulldog partner Ellie Rubin from the firm's Toronto offices.

"PharmaPhone is no more complicated to use than an automated bank machine — and has the added benefit of seeing an actual live person who speaks to you from the kiosk screen."

Rubin said the VISIT system can be used in traditional consumer helplines, financial services, retail operations and training programs.

Founded in 1991, The Bulldog Group is one of Canada's fastest growing marketing and communications firms. Bulldog specializes in developing customized interactive communications for a diverse range of clients. Bulldog integrates marketing expertise with leading edge technology to offer clients interactive multimedia, transactional kiosks and CD-ROM publishing.

Advertiser's Corner

Advertiser's Corner highlights the news, views and backgrounds of companies whose advertisements appear regularly in The CJN.

TORONTO — "It is unfair to take away part or all of Old Age Security (OAS) regardless of your income bracket," says Bunny Bergstein of Sherr, Bergstein & Crackower, an annuity insurance agency.

The agency helps numerous clients, primarily seniors, receive better returns on their money, increase their income in retirement and implement favorable tax treatments in their investment plans. The agency has focused its business efforts in this area for more than 15 years.

Bergstein explains that OAS is a non-contributor universal government pension automatically given to all residents of Canada. Individuals apply at Health and Welfare Canada six months before their 65th birthday.

Bergstein says that when the OAS was established, a 2 per cent surcharge was imposed on everyone's income tax to pay the OAS. "It's not fair to claw back parts of the OAS just because some seniors have been fortunate enough to acquire a relatively comfortable lifestyle that is in excess of $50,000."

He adds that all pension incomes, including OAS, are taxable and individuals in a higher income bracket are paying back up to 50 per cent in income tax.

Canada Pension Plan (CPP) is a contributory pension where individuals and employers both contribute. Applications are filed at the same time as OAS at Health and Welfare Canada.

CPP is considering de-indexing, says Bergstein. If implemented, there will be no increases in income based on inflation.

"If this should happen," says Bergstein, "income will fall behind in a few years and there will be no method of recouping." As the aging population increases, there is an increased cost of CPP contributions and individuals must rely on their own RRSP savings for retirement income.

"We recommend that everyone contribute to the allowable RRSP maximum if they are financially able to contribute to an RRSP." He emphasizes it is important for everyone of all ages to contribute.

"We are seeing the results of those who haven't taken advantage of it and in their later years they are in very poor shape — existing on government pensions and small savings.

"It is becoming more difficult to cope with budgeting."

He says with falling interest rates, more seniors must now depend on invested income from savings. "The drastically reduced income has resulted in a lowering of the standard of living. There is a traditional dependence on guaranteed investment returns. As well, many individuals who invested in mortgages have been hurt financially by mortgage defaults. The income they were depending on is now gone."

Bergstein notes that in the past few years, interest rates have decreased by more than 50 per cent which has drastically impacted on the income seniors were depending on for a good lifestyle, "the lifestyle they were accustomed to."

Discussing mutual funds, Bergstein says many mutual funds are conservative in their investment philosophy and over the years, the returns have always exceeded the returns from interest rate investments. He points out that income can be drawn from mutual fund investments. This will make up the loss of income from guaranteed investment certificates where returns have plummeted.

He advises people plan with professionals who will help them develop the most suited program for them. "The professional is equipped to find an individual's needs based on risk tolerance."

Fate of Hungarian Jews is documented in films

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

The Holocaust seared and decimated Hungarian Jewry. Two movies at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival distil the essence of this devastation.

Good Evening, Mr. Wallenberg, a Swedish production, will be screened on April 30 at 9 p.m. Fragments of Isabella, by an Irish filmmaker, is scheduled to be shown on May 4 at about 7:20 p.m.

Raoul Wallenberg, the savior of tens of thousands of imperilled Hungarian Jews, was really an ordinary person, at least until he thrust himself into his humanitarian work.

As portrayed in Good Evening, Mr. Wallenberg, this unassuming Swedish hero was a rather colorless, perhaps mediocre, figure. Then destiny intervened, and Wallenberg rose to the occasion brilliantly.

Toronto Jewish Film Festival

Kjell Grede's gritty film opens in 1943 in Central Europe. Wallenberg, a food importer, is on a train. He looks out the window and, much to his disgust, sees corpses being dumped unceremoniously from a freight car. The Holocaust has begun.

The scene shifts to Stockholm, where a skeptical rabbi interviews the diffident Wallenberg for a job — an extraordinary job — in Budapest. It is June 1944, and Germany has begun deporting Hungarian Jews to Auschwitz. The rabbi is not entirely convinced that Wallenberg is up to the task of mounting a mission of mercy in Nazi-occupied Hungary, but Wallenberg is hired.

The scene shifts again, to Budapest, circa December 1944. Wallenberg is in a desperate race against time, as the ghetto is to be liquidated. He distributes phony Swedish citizenship documents and arranges for their recipients to be taken to safe houses.

Wallenberg, as competently played by Stellan Skarsgard, is a seemingly unobtrusive figure in a suit who can raise his voice in anger and throw his weight around when it comes to serving the interests of Budapest's beleaguered Jews.

He berates obstreperous German and Hungarian officials, calms jittery Jews and comforts a woman who's lost her family.

Depicted as a man who's consumed by duty and oblivious to his own personal safety, Wallenberg is urged by the Swedish ambassador to leave Budapest. He refuses, although his enemies have threatened him with death.

Budapest is seen as a city of wanton violence: A policeman casually shoots four Jews lined up against a wall. A man is dragged into a house and disposed of. A woman is throttled with a rifle butt.

Good Evening, Mr. Wallenberg is surprisingly static, despite the swirl of events. But it does succeed in conveying a picture of horror and in drawing a well-rounded portrait of a heroic Righteous Gentile.

Based on Isabella Leitner's poignant book, Fragments of Isabella takes the form of a monologue by the author, as played by Irish actress Gabrielle Reidy. The monologue is interspersed with file footage of the war and sombre photographs of Isabella's family.

With bitter sweetness, Isabella recalls her hometown in Hungary. The heady aroma of the market is juxtaposed against the indignity of being cursed as "a dirty Jew."

Isabella and her mother and sisters were deported in the spring of 1944. Many of Isabella's Christian neighbors smiled as they were led off. Not a tear or a good-bye. Not a morsel of sadness. Why? she asks plaintively.

Packed into a nearly airless cattle car, the menstruating Isabella doesn't even possess a simple sanitary napkin. On arrival at Auschwitz, where she lost her mother and a sister, she encounters Dr. Josef Mengele, the so-called Angel of Death. The stench of death overwhelms her.

In November 1944, Isabella is moved out of Auschwitz to a series of concentration camps in Germany. On a death march to Bergen-Belsen, she and her two surviving sisters hide in a barn. They are liberated, and with the assistance of the U.S. consul in Odessa, Isabella reaches America. There she begins anew, basking in the joys of motherhood and intent on teaching her son respect for the sanctity of human life.

As directed by Ronan O'Leary, Fragments of Isabella is a moving testament of one woman's yearning to transcend her fate. Reidy, at once tranquil and tempestuous, leaves an indelible impression.

Theatre troupe's artistic head addresses issues

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sharon Enkin was bitten by the acting bug as a 7-year-old in St. Walburg, a small town in northern Saskatchewan. Over morning coffee in her comfortable downtown Toronto apartment, the Winnipeg-born founder and artistic director of Golden Horseshoe Players, a non-profit educational theatre troupe, recalled the beginning of her love of drama.

The only Jewish child in the town co-founded by her father during the Depression, Sharon Segal was asked to play Mary in the Nativity play at the annual Christmas concert. Faced with objections from her father, who was St. Walburg's mayor, a United Church minister intervened and gave her a poem to recite.

"I think that was the first time I felt the thrill of an audience," said Enkin.

Her love of the stage led her to study Drama and English Literature at the University of Manitoba (the family had moved to Winnipeg when she was 15). She married after graduation and moved with her husband Larry to Hamilton where they lived for over 25 years. They moved to Toronto in 1980. Larry is chief executive officer of Cambridge Clothes.

Marc, the youngest of the Enkins' three children is a musician who writes much of the music for Golden Horseshoe Players.

When the troupe was formed in 1979, Enkin was an old hand at combining drama and education. An alumna of Temple Anshe Sholom's Temple Players, she ran drama workshops for teachers, taught drama at Hamilton's Orthodox day school and volunteered at an inner-city school before returning to school herself to obtain her degree in Education at the University of Toronto.

Since its inception, Golden Horseshoe has evolved from a theatre training project to a company specializing in issues-oriented educational plays reaching thousands of students a year from Niagara Falls to Toronto and north to Muskoka.

Enkin's work was recognized last year when she received an Outstanding Achievement Award from the Ontario Ministry of Citizenship and Ministry of Culture, Tourism and Recreation.

Short Circuit, a Golden Horseshoe production for high school students written by Rex Deverell, was nominated recently for the prestigious Chalmers Children's Play Awards. Enkin commissioned the play following the attack on female engineering students at Concordia University. The play addresses violence against women, gender bias and employment equity.

(The Theory of Relatives, produced by the Tarragon Theatre, is another Chalmers Award nominee with a Jewish connection. Written by Leah Cherniak, Daniel Brooks, Diane Flacks, Richard Greenblatt, Leslie Lester and Allan Merovitz, the play is set at a Passover seder. The 1994 awards will be presented on May 9.)

All Golden Horseshoe productions have an accompanying study guide which includes exercises, discussion starters and resource lists. The young actors in the troupe are trained to lead discussions following the play.

"We're constantly commissioning new works that address issues," Enkin said. Their current repertoire consists of five plays, among them Peacemaker, their longest-running production, now in its ninth year. It concerns children from two warring nations whose curiosity and budding friendship overcome years of prejudice. It was nominated for Canada's Dora Mavor Moore award in 1992 for Outstanding Theatre Production.

"The play addresses prejudice and conflict resolution — a major thrust for many boards of education," said Enkin. "The schools are filled with children from Sri Lanka, the Philippines, Russia. All of them have to learn how to get along together."

Hebron: The Moral Imperative

by Shawn Zelig Aster

Since the picture in the Middle East dramatically changed, and our own self-image as Jews was called into question, journalists, commentators, and other political figures have published dozens of responses to the Hebron massacre. Almost all of these responses reflect the socio-religious or political views and biases of their authors, who have made political hay out of the massacre by using it to support their own views and discredit those of their opponents. This is astute politics, but is a morally and ethically deficient response to what is above all else, an ethical and moral catastrophe of epic proportions.

The responses, of course, are all cloaked in the language of ethics. In a particularly virulent piece, Michael Lerner, noted socio-religious critic of the right, responds to the killing by attacking Modern Orthodoxy for creating the social and religious climate reflected in the killing (New York Times, February 26, 1994). Right wing journalists, in their response, saw fit to blame the Rabin government's policies for fostering, among the Jews of Judea and Samaria, psychological frustration that resulted in the killing. Left-wing cabinet ministers have attacked the right generally for fostering an intolerant attitude towards Arabs, an intolerance, which, they claim, bred the murder. But none of these responses are ethically significant.

Socio-religious and political circumstances create the surrounding conditions in which an ethical violation takes place. But to blame these circumstances for the massacre reduces the absolute condemnation that the massacre must elicit to something relative, something that one does not agree with.

Condemnation Should Be Absolute Not Relative

And herein lies the irony. The massacre should be the subject of absolute condemnation. It must clearly lie beyond the realm of acceptable political or socio-religious views. And yet by relating the massacre to, and moreover, by blaming the massacre on, such acceptable, though disagreeable views, all of these responses reduce their condemnation of the massacre from the absolute to the relative. These political responses blur the line between the absolutely evil and the relatively disagreeable, a distinction that we ignore at our peril.

An absolute line was crossed in Hebron. To whatever extent one disagrees with the right of Jews to settle in the Hebron area, or with the right of the Israeli government to remove them, one must admit that what occurred there moved from the disagreeable into the absolutely evil.

The absolute line lies in the violation of the primary principle of all ethics and morals: the sanctity, or inviolability, of human life.

The sanctity and inviolability of human life is the axiom upon which rests any "How to" guide to ethical behaviour, guides that most of us, thankfully, carry in our heads. The loss of this guide, the violation of this principle, was the only ethically-significant cause of the massacre.

POETRY by Ron Charach

Human Life is Qualitatively Distinct

Because human life has absolute value, it is qualitatively distinct from all other considerations. The value of human life is absolute, hence the human being's life is inviolable. Its inviolability places it beyond any material value or ideological consideration. Material values and ideological considerations can sometimes be ignored because of a higher value or consideration; but there is no higher value or consideration than human life.

When one ignores the absolute value of human life, one crosses an absolute line to commit an act of absolute evil. To connect such an act with political policies or socio-religious ideologies with which one does not agree is to demean the absolute character of the ethical imperative that commands us to view human life as inviolable.

Because it is a primary principle, the inviolability of human life is not subject to proof. It is a universal imperative, which must form the basis of any ethical system.

This imperative certainly forms the basis for the ethical system of classic Judaism. Human life has absolute value because of the revealed notion that "G-d created the human in His own image". Human life is the repository of the image of G-d; "Treasured is the human, created in The Image". (Abot, Chapter 3; see the commentary of R. Israel Lipschutz who rails vociferously against those who would restrict this statement's relevance to Jews alone.) The concept of "the image" requires that human life be seen to have absolute value, above all material or spiritual considerations; consequently, no human being can act of his/her own accord to violate the sanctity of human life.

Human Being is an End Not a Means

Much the same result is achieved by Immanuel Kant, the founder of critical philosophy. Kant has a very different perspective, deriving his ethical theory not from the Divinely-revealed notions, but in universal reason. Nevertheless, he too grounds his ethical system in the principle that the human being possesses an essential dignity. No human being may be treated as a means; every human being must be treated as an end. Human life is never an instrumental consideration, it is always an absolute. Based on this Kantian ideal, the modern conception of human rights sprang up, a conception that is but the consummation of the idea that human life has absolute value and is inviolable.

This principle is the be-all and end-all of ethics; it is an absolute, universal imperative that must never be violated.

A re-affirmation of this principle must echo and resound, rebound and be heard again and again in our response to what took place on the grave of Abraham.

An act of absolute evil was committed and it deserves to be condemned in absolute terms. It deserves to be condemned not in reference to policies and views with which one disagrees, but in reference to the absolute principle that was violated.

No other ethically significant response is possible.

Antisemitism In Russia

by Robert J. Brym

There is a horrifying Russian joke about a poor peasant, Ivan, whose prayers are answered one day. In the midst of pleading to God for deliverance from his misery, an angel appears in a flash of light. "Ivan," says the angel, "I will grant you anything you wish." Ivan cannot believe his good fortune. He sits down, he paces, his imagination races to horizons he had never before allowed himself to visit. Finally, after an hour of frenzied speculation, Ivan claps his hands and says, "Aha, I've got it!" "What will it be then, Ivan?" asks the angel. "My wish," says Ivan, "is that the cow of my neighbour, Boris, should get sick and die."

As this joke testifies, imagination functions according to different rules in Russia. Like Ivan, few people can really dream; some who can, find that their dreams run to extremes. According to a country-wide public opinion poll of 2,000 people conducted by the Institute of Sociology of the Russian Academy of Science in March 1993 only 12 percent of the adult population were satisfied with their lives, 71 percent found it a financial strain even to clothe their families, 61 percent reported a deterioration in living standards over the past three months, 67 percent reported a decline in the political situation over the same period and 41 percent thought that the country ran a high risk of complete anarchy. Only 13 percent of adults trusted the head of state – 17 percent distrusted him – while 71 percent expressed little or no trust in the parliament and 57 percent expressed little or no trust in the government. Meanwhile, a mere 2 percent of the adult population belonged to a political party or movement and 53 percent believed that mass disturbances, antigovernment riots and bloodshed were likely to break out. The poll and others like it show that in Russia there is widespread despair, pessimism and political mistrust but no widely perceived economic and political alternative to the status quo. It also suggests potential danger. As Václav Havel, the former President of Czechoslovakia, recently put it:

> In a situation where one system has collapsed and a new one does not yet exist, many people feel empty and frustrated. This condition is fertile ground for radicalism of all kinds, for the hunt for scapegoats, and for the need to hide behind the anonymity of a group, be it socially or ethnically based... It gives rise to the search for a common and easily identifiable enemy, to political extremism...

Or in the words of Nikolai Popov, one of Russia's leading public opinion pollsters, "people... seem ready to support political demagogues or opportunists... who promise the quick salvation of the country, and a way out of the economic chaos."

Despair Leads to Antisemitism

In this volatile context the question of antisemitism – its level, social distribution, and possible consequences, including its possible political uses – takes on special significance. Antisemites have often blamed Jews for the ills of their societies. Russia has a long tradition of antisemitism and the largest combined number of Jews and people with negative attitudes towards Jews of any country in the world. The potential for casting Jews in their traditional role of scapegoat thus appears large.

I will try to shed some light on the questions I have just raised by focusing on the results of three surveys conducted in 1992 and 1993. These surveys give us the first reasonably precise assessment of how strong antisemitism in Russia is, who the antisemites are and what consequences antisemitism may have for the Jews of the country.

Robert J. Brym is a Contributing Editor of Viewpoints. He is Professor of Sociology at the University of Toronto.

Let us turn first to the question of how widespread dislike of Jews is in Russia. In March 1992, two Russian sociologists were commissioned by the American Jewish Committee to survey a representative sample of nearly 8,000 adults in ten former Soviet republics about their attitudes towards Jews. In Canada outside Quebec about 10 percent of the population expressed dislike of Jews. Dislike of Jews in Quebec was about twice as widespread as in English Canada. In proportionate terms there were nearly three times more antisemites in Russia than in English Canada.

Let us now zoom in on Moscow. I conducted a survey of nearly 1,000 non-Jewish Muscovites in October 1992 with the assistance of a political scientist at Moscow State University. The study was funded by an agency of the Canadian government and the Moscow City Council. The sample was representative of the city's population. Among other questions, I asked: "Do you believe that there is a global plot against Russia organized by Zionists?" I wanted to know how many Muscovites shared this belief because the myth of an international Jewish conspiracy dates back to the 1905 publication of The Protocols of the Elders of Zion by the Tsarist secret police and has since become an established element in the ideological makeup of hardcore antisemites the world over. I found that fully 18 percent of Muscovites believed in this myth and another 24 percent were undecided about whether such a plot exists. Thus 42 percent of Muscovites are open to perhaps the greatest antisemitic canard of all time.

Consider now how Jews in Moscow perceive the problem of antisemitism. Between February and April 1993 I conducted a survey of 1,000 Jews in Moscow, Kiev and Minsk with the assistance of one of Russia's most respected sociologists. The study was funded by an agency of the Canadian government. The survey shows that 98 percent of them believed that antisemitism exists in Russia and 91 percent believed that pogroms are likely or certain to break out. Sixty-three percent claimed to have personally experienced antisemitism. Thirty-one percent expressed a high level of fear of antisemitism.

I have cited a lot of numbers and it is time to ask what significance they hold. Are the Jews of Russia in danger? If so, then how much? What form is antisemitism likely to take? What consequences will it have for the Jews of the country?

Russian State Has Condemned Antisemitism

In briefly answering these questions it is first important to remember that not one pogrom has occurred in Russia since the advent of perestroyka, Jewish fears notwithstanding. The Russian state has openly acknowledged the existence of antisemitism in the country and openly condemned it, albeit not often and not loudly. On some occasions the government has taken legal action against antisemites. True, a good many antisemitic incidents against individuals have been recorded in Russia in recent years – far more beatings, threats, overturned tombstones, swastika daubings, and so forth than we are used to here. At a collective level, antisemites have until recently basically been free to organize, demonstrate and publish, and have attracted proportionately far more members to their associations than the few antisemitic fringe groups that exist in Canada. Since the uprising of October 1993, however, the most notorious of Russia's antisemitic organizations, Pamyat, has been declared illegal. The second failed Putsch was organized by people who showed that they were happy to have their followers use antisemitic propaganda in order to mobilize support. There can be little doubt that if Yeltsin had fallen in October, a new and much more dangerous era would have opened up for the Jews in Russia; a partial return to the black days of Brezhnev with all its restrictions on cultural freedom, economic activity, emigration and so forth. But the point is that the attempted Putsch failed. Perhaps the most dangerous moment in Russian-Jewish history since Stalin's last years has passed. In the political struggle taking place in Russia between the ins and the outs, the reformers and the reactionaries, the people who identify Russia's problems with a Jewish conspiracy are the outs, both politically and demographically. They have been decisively defeated and their chances for a comeback look dim: they are the older, less well educated and poorer elements of Russian society, the people who do not wield much influence now and are not likely to do so in the foreseeable future. Perhaps that is one reason why the percentage of Jews who are very frightened of antisemitism has fallen from 59 percent 6-7 years ago, during the dawn of perestroyka, to 31 percent today.

Difference Between Feeling and Action

Should we not then be concerned about the widespread level of antisemitic feeling in Russia today? Of course we should. But we should also recognize that there is an enormous difference between holding certain beliefs and taking actions that correspond to those beliefs. In order for dangerous people to act in a dangerous way on a large scale they must be well organized. Antisemitism was much more widespread in Romania than in Holland during World War II, but the Nazi genocide machine operated much more efficiently in Holland and proportionately more Jews were killed there because the Dutch had a much better organized bureaucracy which could be pressed into service by the Nazis. What the antisemites in Russia today lack is organization. Yeltsin's recent crackdown gives me confidence that he is intent on keeping things that way.

The Jews of Russia, meanwhile, continue to live in a state of high anxiety. The survey I conducted in the first quarter of 1993 showed that close to a third of them are very frightened and another 40 percent somewhat frightened of antisemitism. The survey also showed that a statistically significant number of them want to emigrate due mainly to the fear that antisemitism generates.

How to Help Russian Jews

In light of my analysis, two courses of action may be suggested for individuals and organizations in Canada who wish to help the Jews in Russia. First, we should encourage the government of Russia to continue its crackdown on the promotion of hatred against Jews and, for that matter, all other groups. Two years ago President Kravchuk of Ukraine stood side by side with members of the Jewish community at Babi Yar and admitted partial Ukrainian responsibility for what happened there during World War II. Such official displays of solidarity and condemnations of intolerance are needed in Russia too. Russians need to be taught to become more tolerant and any educational and confidence-building measures

Israel, The PLO, And Peace

by Harold M. Waller

Shortly after the announcement of the historic Israel-PLO agreement last September, I happened to speak to a colleague in the NAJF who was quite ecstatic about the deal. Even though she shared some of the caution that all of us felt, she was convinced that the agreement was fundamentally a sound idea because it meant that the further spilling of Jewish blood would be averted.

At around the same time, I met an old friend, an American who made aliya many years ago. He was extremely concerned about the dangers of the abrupt about-face of the Israeli government, fearing that the willingness to go to great lengths to accommodate the PLO reflected a loss of will in the Israeli polity, which in turn portended dire existential threats to Israel in the future.

Diametrically Opposed Reactions

These two diametrically opposed reactions to the stunning developments of last summer reflect the dilemma of North American Jewry: an overwhelming desire for peace after many decades of bloody conflict juxtaposed against a well-justified skepticism regarding the intentions of the PLO and its supporters. Who is right? Obviously it is too early to be certain. The terrorist murders of Jews in Eretz Yisrael by Palestinians has not ceased. In fact, it appears that the attempts have accelerated and in particular reflect an audacity that we have not witnessed for a long time. Unfortunately such acts have provoked violent individual and group responses that must equally be condemned. Will further progress in the negotiations, leading to a withdrawal of Israel from Jericho (whatever that term finally comes to mean) and the Gaza Strip, result in the elimination of violence toward Israelis? Assuming for the moment that the PLO genuinely wants such violence to end, will it be able to insure such an outcome? Based on evidence to date, one has to be skeptical. So Israelis have already begun to pay a price for peace – a price measured by the blood of innocents – and will continue to do so. This is not what the government means when it tells the people about the price for peace, but it is a real cost that cannot be ignored.

As for my friend in Israel, his gloomy prognosis cannot be evaluated in the short term, but it can force us to ask some tough questions as the euphoria of that sunny day on the White House lawn gives way to the prickly atmosphere of intense bargaining involved in the process of spelling out exactly what the two parties meant when they signed the Declaration of Principles (DOP).

North American Jews Favorable

North American Jews have generally been very positive about the agreement, in part because they are willing to follow the lead of the Israeli government and in part because they would very much like to see an Israel at peace with all its neighbors. The persistent tension over the occupation, coupled with the difficulties of dealing with the intifada, made many, if not most, North American Jews uncomfortable. A quarter of a century was a long time for an occupation. The reasons why the territories came under occupation are lost in the mists of time, especially for those who cannot remember the anxious month of May 1967 and rely upon the media for their information. Clearly occupation is an unpleasant condition which ought not to last indefinitely. But it is neither illegal nor immoral per se. After all, both Germany and Japan were occupied by Allied troops after 1945 without a great deal of soul-searching. In fact, those occupations were probably quite beneficial to the occupied.

Governments of Israel since 1967 have all been committed to terminating the occupation with peace treaties, even though there has been wide variation over what peace means. The question has been, and certainly is now, what Israel will receive in exchange for ending the occupation. The territories have been Israel's bargaining chip for peace. If they are to be offered for something, Israelis will want to be sure that it is peace. Are Israelis certain that the Palestinians no longer want to eliminate the Jewish state? At a time when Israel is sorely divided, it is useful to recall that what can unite Israelis of virtually all political stripes is the need to maintain the security of the state and its citizens. All Israelis understand the centrality of the security issue in their lives. They may differ about how to achieve it, but they can agree that a major criterion for evaluating the progress of the peace process is the extent to which the outcome enhances the security of the country.

What is Israel Getting?

Just what is being offered here, and is Israel getting peace in return? Even though the agreement speaks only of limited self-government, it is evident that Israel is in the process of relinquishing control over the West Bank and Gaza to the Palestinians, perhaps to a government controlled by the suddenly benevolent PLO, perhaps not. Even if the government of Israel, whatever party is in power, wants to prevent the creation of an independent Palestinian state, it will be exceedingly difficult to do so. Yasser Arafat is already trying to act as if the DOP provided for a sovereign entity. It will likely be possible to hold him at bay during the five year interim period, but after that it will probably be impossible. Both internal pressures among the Palestinians and external pressures from the international community will be difficult to withstand, even if the Israeli government is inclined to resist such an eventuality. Thus it is very likely that there will be a Palestinian state in Gaza and virtually all the West bank. By signing the DOP, Israel in effect agreed to a key aspect of the final status of the territories without securing the necessary security provisions, barring the existence of a secret understanding. Moreover, the concept that non-negligible parts of Judea and Samaria might have to be retained by Israel permanently for security reasons is foreclosed by putting all of the territory, save the Israeli settlements, under the control of the Interim Self-Governing Authority (ISGA). Once territory is under ISGA control during the interim period, can Israel have any reasonable chance of getting it back in final status negotiations? I doubt it.

Dangers in the Principle of Autonomy

One of the roots of the conundrum in which Israel found itself when the possibility of an agreement with the PLO emerged is a direct result of the Camp David Accords, which incorporated the principle of autonomy. I must admit to a bias here. I never liked the idea of autonomy for the Palestinians because I have believed for over 20 years that the proper territorial solution, one which would serve Israeli security needs as well as the desire of the Palestinians to control their own destiny, was a new partition of western Palestine (the land between the river and the sea). The boundary between Israel and the Arabs should be a line (to be negotiated) east of the old Green Line but west of the river, a line that would leave the bulk of the Palestinians on the Arab side of the line, but would allow Israel to be in control of territory that is strategically important but has few Arab inhabitants. The Allon Plan was one attempt to achieve this objective. In the period prior to the Likud's 1977 election victory, the ideas of the governing Labor Party generally followed the same line of thinking.

The idea of autonomy was fundamentally different because it preserved the Green Line as a significant boundary, a feature which is quite explicit in the DOP. If autonomy is seen as an interim step, then the first round of negotiations, about the interim regime, necessarily involves discussing the nature of the autonomy in the entire territory. In the second stage, after the autonomy is in place and the ISGA is operating, negotiations are likely to be about the final status of the area designated for the autonomy regime in the first stage. Thus the Palestinians will be in control, albeit limited control, over the territory whose final status is being determined. Can Israel expect to negotiate a transfer of part of that territory back to full Israeli control under those conditions? That is highly unlikely. On the other hand, had the negotiations been about the division of the territory from the start, they would have been exceedingly difficult but at least Israel would have been taking a stand on fundamental security issues.

No More Enemy Camp

by William Abrams

In 1958, a new novel was published by Jerome Weidman, a very popular writer who focused on Jewish life in America. The title was The Enemy Camp. I bought the book and after reading it, placed it in my library where it has remained for over thirty years. It tells the story of a young New York Jew who was raised in an area where Jews were surrounded by tough Irish boys who beat him up regularly when they caught him alone on the street. He and his family thought of them as the Enemy Camp: hence the title.

Rabbi Dow Marmur's article Taking Risks which appeared in the last Viewpoints issue sent me back to my library to reread Weidman's book; for Rabbi Marmur outlines very clearly the differing perceptions of the outside world held by his mother, himself, and his children. As I had recalled, all the generations in Weidman's book viewed the non-Jewish world as the Enemy Camp. This has in fact been the traditional perception of all generations of Jews for the entire period of the Diaspora, and is reflected in the "modim" prayer that we recite daily. In the Boxer translation it reads: "We gratefully acknowledge that thou art our God. Thou hast been the God of our fathers and thou wilt be the God of our children who will come after us. Thou has been our guardian, our protecting shield in all the generations" (my emphasis). Miraculously, God, who like the Pope has no troops, has managed to preserve the Jews despite the fact that they have been living in the Enemy Camp for over two thousand years.

No More Enemy Camp

But no more. Suddenly, and with unbelievable speed, the Enemy Camp has disappeared. Particularly in North America Jews can now live without fear. True, there are individuals and small groups around the world who continue to fulminate against Jews, but they do not constitute a serious threat either to the lives of Jews or to their basic individual human rights which are now guaranteed by law. Obviously, such a drastic change in a situation that has persisted for two thousand years can be grasped by the intellect but not easily by the emotions. That is why this change has not yet been internalized by Rabbi Marmur's mother and only partially by himself. His children, however, have been born into this new atmosphere and have never experienced life in the Enemy Camp. As Rabbi Marmur writes: "They are fully fledged members of the generation of Jews who have left the periphery and entered world history. I am, at best, only a visitor in that world. My mother does not belong to it at all".

Why Be Jewish?

As a result, today's generation of young Jews is asking a question about Judaism, its relation to God and to the outside world that previous generations never dreamt of asking. The question is: "Why be Jewish?" This was never asked before because Jews never had the option of joining the Enemy Camp and of being accepted, even by conversion; their only concern was to survive. They therefore looked to God to be their "protecting shield in all the generations". The present generation however, does not view itself as needing a protecting shield and, despite Emil Fackenheim's 614th commandment, mere survival as Jews is for them an inadequate "raison d'être". Furthermore, having joined the non-Jewish world the problems facing society generally have become their concerns as well.

Our tradition does posit a role for Jews in relationship to the outside world. This is the concept of Jewish "chosenness" in which the Jews, in accepting the Torah given them at Mount Sinai, also undertook to uphold a higher standard of morality than that practised by the peoples of the world. The understanding was that the Jews would become a "pilot people" who would present to the world an example of righteous living and thereby lead all nations toward the age of the Messiah. In no way was this understood as implying that the Jews were inherently ethically superior to non Jews, only that they were willing to live by the Torah in the hope that this would render them morally superior.

"STUDY (1)" BY GHITTA CAISERMAN-ROTH, MONTREAL

Now, however, the absence of the Enemy Camp has led to adjustments in the theological concepts I have outlined. The notion of a God who acts as a "protecting shield" has given way to the notion of a partnership between God and the Jews to undertake the task of Tikkun Olam – "the redeeming of the world". Rabbi A.J. Heschel pointed the way in his book: God In Search Of Man. Rabbi Robert Gordis in his last book, The Dynamics Of Judaism elaborates: "the principle of social justice flows from the commandment of the affirmation of life... the people of Israel are commanded to act Mipnei tikkun ha'olam, for the improvement of society, for the correction of the unfinished world, for doing the works that the Creator left undone".

A New Interpretation of Covenant

This marks a major change in the theological concept underlying the covenant at Mount Sinai. Instead of simply presenting to the world an example of righteous living, thereby becoming a "pilot people" whom the non-Jews would be motivated to emulate, Heschel and Gordis present to the Jews a more activist reading of the Covenant, which is that rather than preserving our rituals and awaiting the Messiah to cure the ills of society we should work with other nations to attack these problems directly.

This concept of "Jewish chosenness" has been under-emphasized in our tradition throughout our history for several reasons. First, there was the fear that non-Jews who still adhere to the Enemy Camp would seize on this excuse to increase the persecution of the Jews. Secondly, the notion of "chosenness" does not sit well with to-days' emphasis on egalitarianism in Western society. Lastly, there is a difficulty within the Jewish world itself. This is the notion held by secular Zionists who form a large majority in Israel, that Israel must become a "nation like all other nations" – no less and no more. This notion is feasible for Jews living in Israel, where one can be Jewish simply by virtue of being a citizen of a Jewish state. For those of us who live in the Diaspora, this option is not open. We are citizens of Canada, and our Zionism must be based on our religion to be viable. The idea that one can be a citizen of Canada and still be a member of a Jewish nation located elsewhere in the world is logically untenable.

Our leadership, however, is so conditioned to think of Judaism only in confrontation with the Enemy Camp that, since we no longer have in Canada an Enemy Camp to confront, they have looked outward to other parts of the world where the Enemy Camp still exists, and have emptied our Judaism of almost all of its content except that of helping Jews in those areas to combat their enemies and lead normal meaningful Jewish lives. Thus we read in the front pages of our Anglo-Jewish press every week reports of resurgent anti-semitism in Europe, exhortations to stand behind the Israelis in their confrontation with the Arab world, and reminders that we must remember the Holocaust. None of these activities reflect Jewish life within Canada and therefore we are tending to practice "vicarious" Judaism.

Rabbi Marmur illustrated for us how much more difficult it has been for our older generation to recognize that the Enemy Camp no longer exists and this is leading to a growing alienation between our older and younger generations. The activities that I have outlined are not the exclusive concerns of our younger generation; their concerns lie elsewhere. They want to do something concrete to increase the quality of life for Jews (and non-Jews as well) within Canada.

Our present leadership is composed mainly of our older generation; they recognize the growing alienation of younger adults both from communal and religious activities now at the top of our communal agenda, because it is clearly manifested by the ever increasing rate of intermarriage. They are, however, unable to find an answer except to continually reiterate a call for "more Jewish education".

What Kind of Jewish Education?

What is required, in my view, is a thoroughgoing reexamination of the present content of the Jewish education we offer, particularly to college age youth. Students under age thirteen can be taught only the basic rituals necessary to the practice of Judaism; but adolescent and college age youth are old enough to be introduced to a serious study of Jewish theology, which itself must be rethought to reflect the disappearance of the Enemy Camp. Instead of a lachrymose view of Jewish history with the Jews as perpetual victims, we must clearly articulate to them the fact that there is now a real possibility of living a forward-looking, active Jewish life within Canada.

The major step is for our educators to overcome their discomfort with the concept of Jewish Chosenness and emphasize far more the program of action that flows from this concept. Rabbi Alexander Schindler, the leader of Reform Judaism, articulated this point clearly in a recent speech to a general assembly of their Movement. While urging "more, not less" involvement in Israel he said the "vicarious participation in the life of Israel could not substitute for teaching our children and ourselves how to live real Jewish lives at home".

Our present system of education concentrates on ritual and Jewish history, which are easier to impart to children than ethics; the result is that the message being received by our children is more or less the following; learn Hebrew, learn to pray, keep Shabbat, keep kosher, attend synagogue services and raise money for Federations who will distribute it where needed at home and to Israel. This is not exactly a message to stir one's soul.

Our young people have not experienced the Enemy Camp. They have been raised in freedom and mainly in affluence. They do not see themselves as victims, nor are they attracted to a Judaism which seems to boil down to ritual and fund raising. Their concerns are those of the general society today; environmental pollution, gender egalitarianism, control of guns and violence, control of drugs, combatting AIDS and the like. Confronting these ills of society is exactly what is meant by Tikkun Olam's objective of "mending the world" which is today called Social Action – but Social Action for universal as well as Jewish concerns, which of course must continue to be addressed. Tikkun Olam is a basic tenet of Judaism and has been so since our religion began at Mount Sinai – if Jewish educators would impart this message to our young people, they would have an answer to their key question: Why be Jewish?

People Of The Book, Of Blessed Memory

by Rabbi B. Barry Levy

"Hello, Professor Levy?"

"May I please speak with Professor Levy?"

"Hello, is this Dr. Levy of McGill"

The voices are hesitant, the callers unknown, but the tone is unmistakable, very close to that in which rabbis are contacted by the recently bereaved who need help with funeral arrangements.

"I have a collection of Jewish books and I wonder if you or the Jewish Studies Department can use them."

"My father recently died and left us hundreds of old books. Do you or your staff or students need them?"

"We are throwing out some old Yiddish and Hebrew books. Do you want them?"

The voices are more determined now, reassured by having found me, certain of their message, and determined to rid themselves of a burden, though still hesitating, as if wondering if it is the proper thing to do.

"Where are the books? I will come as soon as I can," I reply, again in vivid parallel to the voice of the undertaker or the rabbi. "I will take a look, and then we can talk."

I have participated in this conversation or a reasonable approximation of it dozens of times in my eighteen years in Montreal, and in other North American cities before coming here. As we witness the rapid aging of our local community, the equally rapid shifting of its linguistic affinities, and the ever accelerating interest in forms of entertainment and sources of knowledge other than books, many people are losing their commitment to the importance of the printed word; modernity itself is taking a huge toll on commitment to the need for personal Judaica libraries. Those book collections or accumulations (two helpful terms from the world of philately) that served our parents' generation so well are no longer able to inspire our own, much less to educate or to entertain it.

TV And Computers Challenge Books

Most books cannot compete with television, movies, or video productions, and on-line computer services with virtually infinite data banks that contain potential answers to questions most people have not even thought to ask leave many volumes looking quaint and in some cases obsolete, even before they leave the printer. Interactive productions will soon make the viewer a participant, and one can anticipate the time when a presentation of the Biblical story of Joseph will allow the audience to decide whether or not he acceded to the sexual advances of Potiphar's wife, or when a movie of Moses' escape from Egypt will call for a vote from the viewers to determine if he should counter-attack Pharaoh, cross the Red Sea, head into the desert, or take his chances on the route along the Mediterranean coast. Good books allude to such choices, but except for their (intentional or accidental) ambiguities, the writers assume the responsibility for the decisions. This, we are told, lacks creativity, spontaneity, and adequate personal involvement. Reading, claim the non-readers, is passive and passé.

Even so, our dearly departed book collectors were not a bunch of inert old fogies, and their books are neither defunct nor worthless. Some contain the Jewish classics – in Hebrew, in Yiddish, in Aramaic, or in translation; others are the repositories of the greatest Judaic scholarship of the past generations or the most creative musings of our ancient or modern teachers. Many are useful, some eternally so; a few are figuratively and literally priceless.

Only In Books Do Past And Present Meet

Over the centuries, personal libraries have been described as spiritual havens, as cloisters, as shrines, as places of worship, as fertile gardens, and, above all else, as the places where one might meet and confront the great thinkers of centuries past. Where, but in my library, might the writings of Isaiah, Maimonides, and Spinoza repose in harmonious proximity, anxiously waiting to address me? Where, but in my library, can I muse repeatedly over the ancient and medieval teachings that so definitively shaped our lives as modern Jews or as members of Western civilization? Meet and confront, muse, interact, absorb, think, and challenge. Reading was never passive, at least for those who knew how to read; it is not and never will be passé.

No End To Making Of Books

Nor is the production of books becoming outdated. The world-wide Baal Teshuvah movement, which has seen the return of untold thousands of Jews to their Jewish roots and religious traditions has spawned a new literature of translations, commentaries, and both fiction and non-fiction suited to their needs and interests. A quick look through any Jewish book store provides a glimpse of hundreds of such volumes, which are rapidly replaced by newer ones as they are snatched up by committed families, interested students, and gift-buyers. In fact, the religious community contains many of our most committed users, purchasers, and collectors of books. Additional tomes of Judaic scholarship are brought into print annually by a host of private and public presses, accompanied by other volumes that are major sellers for the leading publishers of popular books; fiction with Jewish themes is frequently seen on the North-American best seller lists. To paraphrase the words of the author of Ecclesiastes well over twenty centuries ago, no end to the making of books is in sight.

Recent decades have witnessed the publication of hundreds of thousands of books on virtually every subject of Jewish interest, and the concomitant reprinting of many others. Rare or inaccessible items have been recorded on micro-fiche, index-card size pieces of plastic that hold hundreds of microscopic pages. Almost no book is really unavailable any more, at least if one is interested only in the contents; accessibility is merely a function of popular demand, or of reprinting and marketing or photocopying costs. Thanks to the lead of Bar Ilan University, hundreds of thousands of seminal Hebrew texts are now available through data-bases and on CD-ROM.

"STUDY (2)" BY GHITTA CAISERMAN-ROTH, MONTREAL

Yet, ironically, this information explosion has contributed to the books growing obsolescence, for if every item can be had at virtually any time, there seems no need to collect books in many local centers; nor does the private library appear as essential to the educated person's intellectual survival as it once was. And surely with so many volumes to be had, only intense and life-long efforts can enable one to amass even a representative collection, surely not all that might be needed for all occasions, probably not even for most isolated situations that require more than a moderate amount of research.

I disagree with most of these assumptions, because privately owned books do not serve the same functions as these other sources of knowledge, but the book's success has necessitated the development of the only worthy competitors to personal libraries, institutional and public ones. And so, as our generation prepares itself for the cultural and intellectual realities of the next millennium, books, especially old books, are one of personal commodities of which many people are divesting themselves.

Examining someone else's library provides entrée to a very private realm, for not only does it give access to the collector's 'mind – exposing perhaps hidden concerns, hobbies, and interests – it also provides a window on his hopes, ambitions, and fantasies. The post-mortem examination of a good private library – its special interests, marginal notes, and prized holdings, even their arrangement on shelves – reveals much about who the departed really was; careful attention to this can help preserve that spirit for a long time to come.

And so when the call comes to visit these collections and to consider how they might be used by the bookkeepers of the next generation, I examine each volume, explore the secret thoughts and dreams of their owners, and try to fathom if the paths they lay out for the potential readers are already adequately delineated by existing collections or, indeed, worthy of being made available at all. With the family, I decide if the books are best left to students or to public or private, Jewish or non-Jewish institutions. Should they go to individual faculty members with abiding interests in the collector's passion (in all likelihood, to be harvested and preserved at a later date) or to a rare book room that will protect them for posterity now?

Interaction Between Reader and Book

How, one might wonder, can families part with these once cherished volumes, symbols of their beloved relatives' hopes and dreams? It is because the interaction of the reader and the book is so totally personal and private. Except for those who teach what they read, few readers have the opportunity to share their book-based excitement with others (and all who teach are not necessarily successful at doing so). The attentive family member knows that someone has enjoyed the books, perhaps even remained in semi-permanent ecstasy because of them, but may have little or no chance of sharing that feeling; the neatly bound pages, often in a poorly understood language, provide only boredom and bewilderment. Someone once loved them; perhaps someone else will. Hence the call to me or to one of the other professionals or amateurs who help with this task.

And what is the donor's primary wish? Above all else, I am asked to insure one thing. Whether the books will reside in private or public hands, the one almost universal request is that they end up where they will be used – where someone else who shares the love and the ecstasy can read the map and walk down those illuminated paths, meet the ancients and the moderns, and join the physical heirs as the collector's spiritual and intellectual descendants.

Canadian Jews and Immigration

by Eugene Kaellis

While the Chinese are as widespread and certainly greater in numbers, historically speaking, Jews are the immigrant people of all time. In the First Century B.C.E., prior to the official beginning of the Diaspora, large numbers of Jews had left their traditional homeland to found communities throughout the Mediterranean Basin. This was done largely for economic reasons, which were then and are still now, the major motivating force for emigration.

The push and pull factors which comprise the incentive to settle elsewhere were, in the case of Jews, usually of the push variety. They were threatened, discriminated against, harassed, subjected to violence, expropriated, and expelled. They sought and found refuge in areas of relative, even if at time temporary, security. They also experienced fatal rejection. During the period of their greatest peril many countries, among them Canada, doomed Jews to annihilation by denying them a haven.

Jews Empathise with Refugees

Through experience Jews have therefore developed a longstanding sympathy toward immigrants, particularly refugees.

Canada now admits refugees and immigrants annually in numbers equal to approximately one percent of its population. This percentage is by no means unprecedented in degree. Indeed, it is lower than at several times in the past. In the first decade of this century, for example, nearly one-fifth of Canada's population entered as immigrants. The difference is that now the great majority of immigrants are non-Europeans, mostly Asians, with increasing numbers from Africa and Latin America. This change has transformed immigration from a fact to an issue.

It could be argued that in earlier periods immigrants were necessary to fill up Canada, but even today, with not many more people than California, Canada has vast, habitable underpopulated areas.

For a variety of reasons Jews can readily appreciate – economic opportunities, the convenience of being close to a supportive community of people who share language, religion, culture and experience, the availability of ethnic foods, and the fear of an inhospitable reception in less cosmopolitan areas – most immigrants settle in one of Canada's three largest cities – Toronto, Montreal, and Vancouver. If present demographic and immigration trends continue, by the early twenty first century Toronto and Vancouver will harbor no majority groups; everyone will find him or her self in a minority position. It is hard to see how this could fail to improve the status of the Jews.

The large number of people who continue coming from relatively exotic cultural and linguistic backgrounds guarantees diversity in our society in spite of assimilationist pressures which continue to exert themselves even within the context of Canada's multiculturalism policy. Thus, although this policy, predicated on diversity, is not dependent on immigration, it is very closely tied to it.

In the last federal election campaign no major part officially challenged immigration per se, but the Reform Party advocated a considerable reduction in the numbers permitted to enter, suggesting that they exceeded Canada's economic needs and capabilities. Unofficially, however, there was much veiled grumbling about immigrants exhausting Canada's social safety net and health programs and depriving real Canadians of jobs at a time of high unemployment. These charges were fuelled by sensationalized reports of alleged fraud by immigrants and refugees in welfare schemes, etc.

The facts, however, are that as a group, immigrants, who are screened for occupational, monetary, and health qualifications before they are allowed entry into Canada, use proportionally less welfare and unemployment insurance and fewer health services than native-born Canadians. If federal and provincial governments allocated adequate funds for language training and settlement services, reducing the social and economic problems of immigrants, the net cost to the taxpayer would be even less.

As far as their general effect on the economy, studies by the government and several think tanks have concluded that immigrants are economically beneficial to Canada.

Without immigration, Canada's low birth rate would result in a decline in our population. The present immigration policy not only acts as a corrective, because the average age of New Canadians is five years less than that of native-born Canadians, it offsets the decline in the workforce and the drop in consumer spending that normally accompanies the ageing of a population. A decrease in the number of Canadians would make the individual burden of taxes heavier, increase the cost of reducing the national debt, and threaten the maintenance of our unemployment insurance, welfare, health, and pension systems. The latter are especially important to the Jewish community, which is ageing more rapidly than the general population and any other ethnic group in Canada.

A decline in Canada's work and consumer population would, by diminishing our productivity and domestic market, also dash hopes of getting out from under a branch plant economy in which economic decisions affecting Canadians are made elsewhere, usually the United States.

Many Immigrants Bring Capital and Connections

Many immigrants, particularly from East Asia, inject needed capital into the Canadian economy, a major factor in attenuating the effects of the recession in Western Canada. Many immigrants retain connections to their countries of origin, and their knowledge of foreign cultures, business methods, and languages makes them a valuable asset in facilitating trade with the world's fastest growing economies, in East and Southeast Asia. The cost of integrating immigrants and teaching them English or French has to be balanced against the fact, usually overlooked, that many of them have already been raised and educated at foreign expense.

It is apparent then that Jews, along with other Canadians, can benefit from immigration. The multicultural policy, which immigrants help sustain, has been of noteworthy benefit to the Canadian Jewish community not only in helping support cultural agencies and programs but in creating an environment of acceptance of minority cultures and religions. Canadians who are concerned that the infusion of foreign cultures will undermine Anglophone Canadian culture are missing the point. The more Anglophone Canadian culture is dominated by Anglo-Saxonism, the more permeable it is to the inroads of American culture.

Nevertheless, along with other Canadians, some Jews react to the culture shock of seeing large numbers of people from non-European backgrounds arriving to make their homes in Canada. This, in spite of the fact that it is Europeans who have for centuries been the people most antagonistic to Jews.

Although the growing rapprochement between Israel and Palestinians and other Arabs has created a thaw in the relations between Jews and these ethnic-religious groups in Canada, there is understandably still considerable anxiety regarding Islamic immigrants and refugees, who are seen as sharing an antipathy toward Jews and Israel.

Muslims Less Biased Against Judaism

The Islamic community in Canada is heterogeneous in origin, in denomination, and in politics. Many Muslims come from countries not directly involved in the Middle East conflict. Some Muslims are anti-Israel, others are not, and many are indifferent. Moreover, antagonism between Jews and Muslim Arabs rests largely on a political conflict now in the process of being significantly alleviated. From a religious perspective, Jews and Muslims have closer ties with one another than Jews have with Christians. The anti-Judaic references in the Koran represent a piquedness (expressed toward Christians as well); they do not constitute the kind of anti-Judaism that is a fundamental part of Christianity. As the Palestinian question is resolved and closer organic ties based on trade, water resource management, joint projects, and tourism between Israel and its Islamic neighbors become realities, there is bound to be an improvement of ties between the Jewish and Islamic communities in Canada.

The latest census figures show that as a consequence of immigration the proportion of non-Christians in Canada, including Jews, is rising. Buddhism, Hinduism, and Sikhism, among the major religions of Asian and African immigrants, have no historical

EDITOR'S NOTEBOOK

In this issue we offer a "tour d'horizon" of almost all issues currently on the agenda of every thinking Jew: the peace process; our position within the political process in Canada; antisemitism; Israel/Diaspora relations; liberalising Canadian immigration policy for Jews trying to escape persecution; the importance of maintaining our tradition as being "people of the book"; the necessity of updating our theology to conform to the famous legal maxim: "law must conform to life, or the people perish".

Before receiving Harold Waller's article, I would have said that all aspects or nuances of the ongoing discussions seeking to achieve a lasting Arab-Israeli peace have been more than thoroughly explored. However, Waller's analysis of the implications of the interim agreements that have been reached will alert many of us to possible dangers that we have not considered hitherto. He warns that we must not be too eager "to grasp the prospect of peace without being sure that the basis for peace is really there".

Robert Brym has been following the effect that the breakup of the Soviet Empire, resulting in increased autonomy of its component states, is having on the incidence of antisemitism in those states. He cites two overriding factors: first that throughout the centuries antisemitism has been a permanent feature of Russian society; secondly, not one pogrom has occurred in Russia since perestroyka. Nonetheless he has been carefully charting the changes in Russian dislike of Jews within the former Soviet Union, and shares the results of a number of in-depth polls with us. His advice to Canadian Jews is to continue to press our government to recognize that many Russian Jews are in fact refugees and so deserve to be admitted into Canada.

In my own article I have attempted to delineate the single most important and hopeful change vis-à-vis the Jewish people throughout North American society and that is the disappearance of the "Enemy Camp" meaning general society which has threatened Jews unceasingly for the past 2000 years of Diaspora life. The change has come about so rapidly during our lifetime that most of us have not recognized the opportunity to drop the "protecting shield" we have erected against the general society, and instead persist in standing apart and continuing our protective stance. I try to explain that our younger generation who have never had to raise a "protecting shield" and are therefore interested in entering the general society while retaining our religious and cultural identity, find our position to be inward-looking and irrelevant to their concerns.

Throughout Western society, faced with shrinking populations, a fundamental rethinking of attitudes toward immigrants is going on. Eugene Kaellis presents the case for the liberalisation of Canada's policy on immigrants. He points out that particularly in a country still largely empty of population, immigrants can benefit our society by bringing their skills, their capital and in many cases their education all of which can bring about an important improvement in the economic and cultural life of Canadian society. He emphasizes that Jews still face persecution outside of North America and therefore should qualify as refugees who should be admitted to our country.

Rabbi Barry Levy reminds us of our traditional role as "people of the book" which he feels is being threatened by the impact of film, television, and all the distractions of modern society. He offers an eloquent and spirited defense of the continuing importance of books in the life of every Jew who wishes to remain true to his tradition.

Two poems by Ron Charach complete our issue.

THE FUTURE

Safe for now in The Future Bakery-Cafe smiling peasants from the steppes beaming on the storefront brick, mound of buckwheat kasha veined with shreds of onion leaning on cabbage rolls, Russian accents at the cash as real as the cold scarlet beet-borscht, a dollop of sour cream for a muggy summer's evening.
Buttering slices of caraway rye under the awning, sipping borscht, why mind
if a dazed man dressed in plastic bags stops by to pan us?
Vrrrooooom! A carload of immigrants tears up Bloor in a battered Buick, a newish mattress-and-box-spring tied to the roof, its plastic cover flapping like a raucous boast in the man-made breeze–
Tailing them, ignoring stoplights
evading traffic, an Evil Eyed great-aunt who voted against the journey to the New world.

Just across bustling Bloor-by-The Annex the Lickin' Chicken
with its "Sorry, we have chicken" sign, whimsy from borscht belters who once proclaimed:
"Yes, we have no bananas."

Oh God of many tongues and faces, spare us our reflections in skyscraper glass.
Hold us gently in a city by a lake with a dome, a tower, –but no hill, save the many-coloured backs of its people.

AFTER RELIGIOUS SCHOOL

Orbiting the ivy-covered Temple
two hundred parents in Volvos,
Jeeps and mini-vans descend to claim precious cargo.
The soot has finally been scoured from the northwest wall of the school, reminder of the fire that thankGod no man kindled, an accident of drawings on a hot rad.

What a kaleidoscope of snowsuits pours into the center hall!
So many sizes of colour-coordinated kids;
bandy-legged boys in a litany of team hats,
socially practiced girls in Indian braids or the flouncy ponytails of braids recently untied, – some wearing a splash of coppery freckles

The joyous clamor of these getaways makes me forget the waif who lives above the chicken 'n rib shop, who each day must smell the food
his mother can only buy a few times a year.
Though a swirl of autumn leaves about the stone steps reminds of the coming of pagan Hallowe'en, with its universal access to the sweet.

ISRAEL, THE PLO, AND PEACE

The pursuit of the idea of autonomy is leading Israel into a situation where it will likely have to make compromises in the final stage negotiations that will adversely affect security. The problem of maintaining control over border crossings during the interim period, which clearly is Israel's responsibility under the DOP, will seem minor in comparison to negotiations over security matters in the final stage negotiations. If things cannot be settled satisfactorily, can Israel send the IDF back in? If no final status agreement is reached after five years, can Israel maintain the interim regime indefinitely? These are some of the dilemmas created by the autonomy approach with its two stages of negotiation (actually three or more because of the vagueness of the DOP).

After 1967 Labor Party Ideas Evolved

After the loss of power in 1977, thinking within the Labor Party evolved considerably. The idea of a Palestinian state is no longer anathema and the notion of holding on to some territory for security reasons has been relegated to a secondary consideration. The response to the assertion that a new partition was necessary was always that no Arab party was willing to negotiate on that basis. This led to a search for new solutions, such as autonomy. When Menachem Begin first proposed the autonomy plan, he did not foresee that it would lead to the kind of denouement that we are now witnessing. But the plan has evolved over the past 15 years as different Israeli governments have had the responsibility for formulating a position on it.

Interestingly, one of the arguments used currently to justify transforming the autonomy plan from an attempt to keep all the disputed territory under Israeli control with limited self-government on a permanent basis for the Palestinians into the blueprint for an independent Palestine controlling virtually all of the territory east of the Green Line is ein breira, there is no choice. The concept of ein breira is loaded with significance in Israeli history. It is associated with doing the impossible out of necessity, often in military conflict. If you asked an Israeli 30 or 40 years ago how he and his country could overcome impossible odds to succeed, the reply was simply ein breira. Is it now appropriate to transform the term to justify policy changes that were previously unthinkable? Is it an accurate description of reality? Was this particular agreement the only possible course of action for Israel to take?

There is no doubt that Israel has achieved some major gains by taking this step. Many of the benefits will not arrive until some time in the future, but Israel's international position in both political and economic terms has definitely improved. If this works out, Israel has the opportunity to normalize its position in the Middle East, thereby opening the potential for growth and cooperation with erstwhile enemies. Israelis will no longer have to police a resentful and hostile population, a task that was becoming increasingly distasteful for a broad spectrum of the population.

Shortcomings of the Agreement

The shortcomings of the agreement also have been discussed widely. For one thing, too many things were left open-ended in the DOP. The delineation of Jericho's boundaries and the matter of controlling the borders are only the most salient issues. The position of Israelis living in the territories is dealt with, but not in sufficient detail. The very imposition of specific calendar deadlines for the conclusion of negotiations that were bound to be difficult and contentious was an example of shortsightedness or naïveté. The problems of combatting terrorism were not addressed in sufficient detail. In general the agreement suffers from an unreasonable dependence on the PLO to maintain a situation that will satisfy Israel's needs and a failure to think through all of its implications, especially in terms of the connection between the interim agreement and the final stage negotiations.

What does all of this mean for North American Jews? Most of us are inclined to respect the decisions of the Israeli government, which, after all, is accountable to the Israeli electorate. If this agreement really means the end of Israeli soldiers dying in battle and civilians falling victim to terrorist attacks, then it is the Israeli people who will benefit and who will reward the government accordingly. Understandably Israelis are tired of war, tired of reserve duty, tired of eternal vigilance, and tired of external hostility. North American Jews must hope that the direction in which Israel is now headed reflects a correct assessment of the strategic situation and will lead to well-deserved relief from the burdens that its citizens have shouldered for decades. But precisely because of our distance, a distance which has relieved us from the necessity of sharing all of those burdens, we ought not to be vulnerable to the danger of jumping too eagerly to grasp the prospect of peace without being sure that the basis for peace is really there. North American Jews share with their Israeli counterparts a concern that Israel not jeopardize its security in the pursuit of peace. We can make a contribution by helping to identify possible pitfalls in terms of security while at the same time being sensitive to the changes in Israeli society that have led Israel to this momentous undertaking.

Euphoric or Fearful?

Should we be euphoric or fearful as the peace process proceeds? Neither emotion is the right response for North American Jews. The problems and dangers that Israel continues to face, including those with regard to the Palestinians but also the threats from the likes of Syria, Iraq, Iran, and Libya, remind us that euphoria is inappropriate. On the other hand, recent developments open up some very positive possibilities. While being supportive of the initiative because Israel's legitimate government has now made this the policy of the country, we must simultaneously be vigilant regarding the continuing security threat and support efforts to insure that both the interim and final agreements regarding the territories will not compromise the protection of vital Israeli interests. Israel is not engaged in a hypothetical exercise; rather it is making life and death decisions that are of vital importance not only to itself but to the entire Jewish people as well. As we formulate our own positions on the issues, we must constantly be aware of that fact.

that can be supported by Canadians should be.

Second, concerned Canadians should continue to press their own government to recognize that many Russian Jews are refugees according to the United Nations definition of the term and so deserve to be admitted into Canada. Recently the Canadian Immigration Review Board has shown increasing reluctance to extend the definition of refugee to Russian Jews. However, when large numbers of Jews in Russia demonstrate in public opinion surveys that they are fearful for their wellbeing due to antisemitism and are making plans to leave as a result, the IRB's reluctance seems largely unwarranted. This point has been made most vociferously by our immigration lawyers in court and by Jewish individuals and organizations who are in a position to influence the Canadian government. We should not feel that we are somehow robbing Israel of citizens by doing so. Although it would take me too far afield to document the point here, two 1993 surveys conducted in Russia show that a surprisingly small percentage of Jews wish to emigrate to Israel. I estimate that in all of the former USSR fewer than 10 percent of Jews wish to emigrate and give Israel as their first-choice destination; in Russia the figure is less than 5 percent. Many Russian Jews would prefer to stay in Russia, with all its problems, rather than move to the Jewish state, with its alien culture and extremely high unemployment rate for highly educated Russian immigrants. Over the next few years the emigration movement is thus likely to dwindle rapidly in size. The Jews of Canada would therefore not be draining potential citizens away from Israel if they were somehow able to encourage the Canadian government to be more generous in its policy toward admitting Russian Jews as refugees. Rather, we would be acting in one of the few ways at our disposal to actually help the Jews of Russia deal with the problem of antisemitism in a meaningful way.

or constitutional antipathy toward Jews.

These are important factors to keep in mind when Jews react on cultural or racial lines to the presence of Somalis, Punjabis, and others in their neighborhoods. The events surrounding the reception of Somalis in Dixon, a place near the Toronto International Airport, which received national coverage on CBC TV, demonstrate precisely how native-born Canadian,s including Jews, should not approach the settlement of refugees and immigrants in their communities.

Jews Should Remember Their Own Immigrant Experience

Jews ought also to keep in mind their own history as newcomers to North America before passing judgement on the current crop of immigrants. Almost every immigrant group – the Irish, the Italians, the Chinese.. and the Jews – has gone through its gang phase. A Jewish neighborhood in New York was the stamping ground of Murder Incorporated, a gang of professional killers led by people like Lepke Buchalter and Jacob Gurrah Shapiro, murderers and thugs who committed crimes as infamous and dastardly as any attributed today to Asian street gangs. It was a Jewish neighborhood in which people were killed for reneging on gambling debts owed to Jewish bookies and loan sharks. It was Jewish athletes who were bribed by professional Jewish gamblers to shave points or throw fights. It was Jewish children who ran errands for illegal gambling syndicates. History, not only compassion, calls us to restrain ourselves from making general condemnatory statements about other immigrant groups.It is not unusual for members of one minority group to turn against the recent immigrants of another group or even of their own. At the beginning of large scale immigration to North America by poor and ignorant Jews from Eastern Europe, the wealthier, better educated, and established Jews from earlier immigrations (mostly from Central Europe) were hostile. The newcomers, they thought, would undermine their own hard won and still vulnerable position in North American society. Later, ethical tradition and practical good sense made them change their minds and organize aid agencies to ease settlement and integration of the newer arrivals.

Anti-immigration Groups Often Racist

Many opponents of immigration to Canada, regardless of the concealment they often attempt by the use of code words, are motivated by racism. There has never been a single instance of racism initially directed toward any group which did not eventually redound to the detriment of Jews. Running with the jackals provides no safety; at one point, they turn on whoever is at their side.

And a stranger shalt thou not oppress; for ye know the heart of a stranger, seeing ye were strangers in the land of Egypt, is still an excellent practical as well as ethical guideline for Jews to follow in Canada in the late twentieth century.

Quebec leaders make their pitch at CJC plenary

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Parti Quebecois leader Jacques Parizeau's message to the Jewish community here is the need to establish a society that functions in French — a language he used exclusively in his address last Sunday to the Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region's triennial plenary.

Many plenary participants were surprised that Parizeau, who speaks fluent English, did not employ a single word of the language, especially at a time when the PQ has been trying to reassure minorities they will have an equal place in an independent Quebec.

While CJC has stressed to Quebec politicians that the Jewish community is bilingual and completely at home in French, many saw Parizeau's speech as a warning of things to come, and a discourtesy to older people who are less likely to understand French.

CJC community relations chair Max Bernard saw it as simply poor politics.

"It's not a way to win friends and influence people," Bernard said later.

Parizeau explained to the media that he had been invited in "an official capacity" as opposition leader and therefore should speak the official language of Quebec.

Nonetheless, the audience was pleased to hear that Parizeau supports maintenance of the government's subsidization of Jewish day schools.

The PQ leader praised Jewish schools' quality and the contribution their graduates have made to the cultural and intellectual life of Montreal.

He later told reporters he would like to see even greater provincial support for Jewish schools.

(The general studies curriculum of the 16 schools is subsidized at 52 per cent of the public schools' rate. The community has asked the government for associate status with a public school board, a move that could qualify Jewish schools for 100 per cent funding.)

Parizeau also told the plenary that as premier, he would find a solution to the problems Bill 101 pose to the Jewish community in terms of restricted admission to English schools and the hiring of rabbis and educators from the United States.

English-speaking culture is part of the heritage of Quebec, Parizeau emphasized, citing such authors as Frank Scott, Stephen Leacock, Hugh McLennan and — hesitantly — Mordecai Richler.

MONTREAL — "If at all possible," a re-elected Liberal government in Quebec would maintain and even increase financial support for the province's Jewish day schools, Premier Daniel Johnson said last Sunday at Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region's (CJC-Q) triennial regional plenary.

In a lunchtime keynote address to a crowd of 400 at the Bonaventure Hilton Hotel, the premier said the maintenance of provincial support for Jewish day schools would be in keeping with the emphasis his government places on investing in the future and "in people."

Part of this investment, he indicated, includes the educational system.

Speaking to reporters later, Johnson said his continuing support for Jewish day schools was a "reaffirmation" of his government's commitment to Quebec's private schools.

That commitment, he said, followed discussions with Joseph Rabinovitch, executive director of the Association of Jewish Day Schools, the Jewish school system's lobbying organization.

In his general remarks to the luncheon audience, Johnson appeared relaxed and moved between English and French. He also congratulated CJC on its 75th anniversary.

Johnson repeated his government's commitment to open more doors to private and public sector jobs for anglophones and minority communities, and to create more jobs and training programs to spur young people, including young anglophones, to stay in Quebec.

He said he has witnessed the Jewish community's "burning ambition" to have its young people live and work in Quebec.

"Our preoccupation is the same," he said.

To accomplish that task, Johnson outlined a five-point job-creation program, which includes generating more investment and trade; job-training and entrepreneurial programs for youth; and identifying and supporting new sectors for investment.

Johnson took credit for a 1.5 point decline in unemployment in the province over the preceding 12 months, and said his government would seek to reduce it another five points over the next five years.

Johnson said the next election will be "extremely important" because it will "shape the future" of the province within the North American context.

Federation rescues JCC

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The financial crisis that has seen Toronto's Jewish Community Centre (JCC) teetering on the verge of bankruptcy may be over.

Under terms of a recent agreement between the JCC and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (JFGT), the federation will bail out the JCC by purchasing its Bathurst Street branch for $5 million, with $4.5 million of that going towards paying down part of the JCC's debt. Five hundred thousand dollars will be used to operate the centre.

The JFGT will also help a local ownership group take over the Bloor Street branch while a local members group will take control of the Northeast Valley branch, without any financial assistance from the federation.

The $5 million earmarked for the Bathurst property will come from money that had been allocated to the United Israel Appeal (UIA), said Bernard Ghert, president of the JFGT.

A special campaign to make up the shortfall will be held to solicit contributions for the JCC and for the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, which is expected to be relocated in a facility to be constructed behind the Bathurst Street branch.

"That money will go back into the UIA pipeline," Ghert said.

The new arrangement will also see a complete restructuring of the JCC. Three new corporate entities will be formed to own each of the main JCC properties. An additional three corporate bodies will operate and manage each facility. Because the federation is pouring large sums into the Bathurst branch, it will retain the right to nominate half the directors of the facility's new management corporation, Ghert said.

The federation, which is lending $750,000 over three years to help in the purchase of the Bloor Street facility, will control 25 percent of its board. The Valley centre will be completely controlled by its members.

Yet another corporate entity, also under the federation's control, will link all three facilities. The status of the Koffler Gallery and the Leah Posluns Theatre, which are both part of the JCC as it is currently constituted, is still in limbo as it is unclear how they will be linked to the reconstituted JCC, Ghert said.

Spokesmen for the JCC were pleased with the reorganization plan. "I think the structure of the financing is very good for the JCC," said the agency's president, David Perlmutter. "We like the arrangement because it makes the federation more sensitive and aware of the programming offered at the JCC and its importance to the community and perhaps they will help us find more funding for these programs."

"It's very good news that the agency's financial problems are being addressed and that its financial affairs will be put in order," said Mark Sarner, chair of a Bloor committee that has studied the future of the branch. "It provides the ideal context

Berys Richardson and students at Moncton's Jewish preschool.

Baptist teacher helps Moncton Jewish preschool thrive

By JOAN SICHEL
Special to The CJN

MONCTON — When you live in a small Jewish community, you learn to accommodate, to work things out. You do the best you can to maintain your religion and culture, and develop your own traditions, and teach them to your kids.

Making adaptations that are not compromises of faith make you stronger. We don't just want to survive, we want to thrive. And that is the case with Moncton, N.B., home to 200 Jews.

Despite not having a Jewish preschool teacher or enough Jewish kids to fill a class, Moncton's Jewish preschool is blossoming.

Now in its 14th year, the Jewish preschool of Tiferes Israel Synagogue, Moncton's Orthodox and only Jewish congregation, has a non-Jewish teacher. Berys Berry Richardson is the wife of a Baptist minister who is president of the Atlantic Baptist College in Moncton.

The idea of a Jewish preschool was first put forward 15 years ago by David and Margie Attis, Monctonians who had lived in Toronto before moving back east. They wanted the best Jewish education for their four daughters before they got to public school. They were joined by a group of Jewish parents who shared the dream.

Then, there were enough young families with preschoolers. Space in the synagogue was available, the naysayers were hushed, and the Board of Directors gave its blessing. Canadian Jewish Congress helped develop the curriculum. With $5,000 from its small communities committee, and seed money from the Canadian Zionist Federation and the Atlantic Jewish Council, the preschool was set up. Local donations helped build the tables, chairs and bookshelves, and renovate to government standards.

A local teacher could not be found. Advertisements in the Montreal and Toronto papers brought one who lasted only two months.

Serendipity came in the form of Richardson, a sought-after supply teacher with a master's degree in religious education.

Her Bible background and avowal that she was not there to capture little Jewish souls gave the community the courage to take a chance. Interviewed by the rabbi of the day, Philip Lefkowitz, she reaffirmed her understanding and her good intentions, and was hired. It was the best thing we could have done.

Not everyone in the community was convinced. With support from the rabbi, she integrated the Jewish component, the culture, traditions, customs, songs and Hebrew language into her preschool program.

Word spread that Richardson was teaching in the Jewish pre-school, and non-Jewish parents flocked to enroll their kids. We benefited from her personal reputation.

Because of the small Jewish population, we opened the door to all comers. The number of Jewish students have fluctuated from the earliest days of 14 students to today, when there are four. Soon the advantages of having other children in the preschool was apparent.

The preschool became a show piece for public relations. Children of prominent non-Jewish lawyers, business people, professionals flock to the school. Many of them had never really socialized with Jewish people before, and easy relationships and understanding developed.

Parents bringing their kids into shul learn what we are all about, and about Judaism, the customs and holidays. They discover the similarities and differences, how we are the same in so many ways. Some of the parents have to explain to their children that they are not themselves Jewish.

Waterloo shul, church plan to share facilities

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

KITCHENER — In a unique public display of cooperation, Jews and Christians came together here last week to announce Canada's first-ever joint worship and community centre.

Representatives from Temple Shalom, the area's lone Reform synagogue, and Westminister United Church signed an agreement to build a shared centre in nearby Waterloo.

The $1.1 million facility is to include separate but joined sanctuaries, as well as classrooms, offices, a kitchen, nursery and community hall. It will be open for use by both congregations and made available to community groups.

Construction is expected to start in early 1995, with completion scheduled for that September.

The building will be situated at 572 Erb St. W., currently occupied by a two-storey house the church uses for meetings, social events and after-school programs.

The site was acquired 10 years ago by the United Church, which will own the joint facility. Temple Shalom will initially hold a five-year lease.

"We know of no instance anywhere in the world of a Jewish and Christian congregation actually beginning their relationship by designing a building together," said Temple Shalom president Laura Wolfson at a press conference.

There are three shared Jewish/Christian facilities in the United States but this one will be a Canadian first, Wolfson added.

Seats in the temple will face east, as required, separated by a moveable wall from the church seats, which will face west. If more space is needed, either congregation can use the other's sanctuary, Wolfson told The CJN.

Founded in 1966, the temple has rented space from the Church of the Good Shepherd on Queen Street in downtown Kitchener since 1987. The joint building will also provide Westminster Church with a permanent home, since it too has rented space for Sunday services, in a local school gymnasium.

The agreement between the temple and the church is the result of more than a year of negotiations. The whole thing started when Mark Pancer, a temple past president, had a chat with his next-door neighbor, Jim Robinson, chair of the church's building committee.

"When we realized that both congregations were looking for new, more permanent quarters, we said, 'Hey, maybe we can do something together,' "Robinson recalled.

The temple currently has 50 family members, 30 children enrolled in the religious school and a teen group. There's no full-time spiritual leader but a student rabbi, Michael Cahana of Toledo, Ohio, comes for one weekend a month.

"We became excited about developing a project with a congregation of another faith," said Jake Driedger of Westminister United Church. "We believe that all people, regardless of their religious beliefs, can live together in God's love and work together in harmony."

Ottawa changes refugee aid

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) has mixed reactions to Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi's recent changes in financial aid for immigrants.

Marchi announced recently that from now on, refugees will be charged $500 each to apply for permanent residence in Canada.

And a federal program that gave needy refugee claimants up to $600 a month for clothing, food and housing will now be available only to refugees sponsored and brought here by the government.

JIAS national executive director Susan Davis says she's "saddened" that refugee claimants, who arrive in Canada with little or no money, will have to pay $500 for the right to stay.

"It's an additional hardship," Davis told The CJN. "One has to recognize that $500 is a lot of money for a refugee."

Landed immigrants often arrive here with money from the sale of property at home, while refugees come as visitors, Davis explained.

But much of the new burden will be offset, Davis added, by the fact that refugee claimants are now allowed to work in Canada while their applications are being reviewed — another recent change announced by Marchi.

"We see in our caseload that [claimants] are working. [The fee] is a hardship but when people want something enough, they meet the hardship."

As for the monthly stipend Ottawa gives needy refugee claimants, Davis feels it will hit Jewish immigrants from eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union hardest.

As she sees it, those immigrants have the least abilility to fend for themselves in their first few months in Canada.

The changes, Davis believes, are intended to attract more entrepreneurial immigrants — such as businesspeople and scientists — those who won't need help.

But in the former Communist bloc, there were 70 years with no entrepreneurial spirit, and immigrants from there need aid once they arrive, Davis explained.

As well, the vast majority of Jewish immigrants are not government-sponsored, and only that class will receive the aid.

Ottawa last week released its list of the most desirable occupations sought in immigrants.

Among the most sought-after skills are kosher food cooks.

Ontario Tory leader Mike Harris stands outside Jerusalem's Old City walls during his recent visit to Israel.

Harris learns more about Israel

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mike Harris won't say it but his aides do: The visit to Israel this month by the leader of Ontario's Progressive Conservative party was part of the education of "a premier-in-waiting."

Whatever the motives for his whirlwind four-day trip through Israel, Harris says he came away with a better understanding of the country's security concerns and a clearer picture of what the average Israeli thinks about the self-rule accord with the PLO.

Harris — indeed, most of Ontario's political apparatus — is almost on a war footing, ready to pounce the moment Premier Bob Rae calls an election. The Tory leader has always been keen on developing a global view and he's on the board of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem. So the time was ripe for a visit to Israel, on the heels of recent visits by Rae and Toronto Mayor June Rowlands.

And Harris says he's always wanted to visit Israel, "to understand the Middle East a little better."

The trip took the Tory chief, his wife Janet and their 9-year-old son Michael Jr. on an unofficial tour of the major attractions, both Jewish and Christian.

Along the way, Harris held talks with two members of the Knesset, Likud's Dan Tihon and Emanuel Zisman of Labor; foreign affairs ministry director general Eitan Bentsur; Canada's ambassador to Israel, Norman Spector; and Palestinian academic Mahdi Abdul-Hadi.

The itinerary included Tel Aviv, Nazareth, Tiberias, Metula (Israel's northernmost settlement), the Golan Heights and Jordan Valley, Jericho, Jerusalem and the territories.

"What impressed me," Harris told The CJN in an interview at his office, "was how they were able to irrigate the land with so little water. I thought, 'Here's a desert turned green.'

"I remember standing on the Golan Heights, being able to see Syria, Jordan and Israel, and appreciating a little more how concerned Israelis are about them."

In conversations with "average" Israelis, Harris said it seems "virtually unanimous that people want to give peace a chance. There's an understanding that Palestinians need a homeland. And there's a sense of optimism and hope."

From Palestinians, Harris said the feeling was that there's more to fear from Muslim fundamentalist groups than from Israel.

Both sides of the conflict, Harris noted, sounded an urgent need to improve the lives of Palestinians in the territories through foreign investment, if self-rule is going to work.

He described Jerusalem as "awe-inspiring," and paid a visit to Yad Vashem and its Children's Memorial.

An Anglican, Harris visited the Church of the Multiplication of the Loaves and Fishes, the Mount of the Beatitudes and Capernaum, site of Jesus's first public sermon.

Later that week, Harris was in the Vatican to attend a papal concert marking Yom Hashoah. He was part of a delegation of about 100 people, including several Canadian Holocaust survivors, who met with Pope John Paul II.

Biluim program going to Italy

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Young Judaea is adding a new component to its Biluim youth leadership program for 17-year-olds who have completed Grade 11.

This summer's five-week Israel-based program will be preceded by three days in Italy to commemorate the ha'apalah (illegal immigration) which helped bring about the establishment of the State of Israel.

After touring Rome, Naples and Pompeii, participants will board the ship Atlanta at Brindisi to sail for Atlit, retracing the steps of the illegal immigrants. Their stay in Italy is scheduled to include a meeting with Avi Pazner, Italy's Israeli ambassador.

Seminars and games during the three days on board will culminate in a simulation of the arrival of the illegal immigrants at Atlit. Shabbat will be celebrated on the ship.

The program in Italy and on board ship, known as Ma'apilim, was developed by the Jewish Agency's Youth and Hechalutz department.

"In addition to programmatic value, this new venture will enable [participants] to meet teenagers from diverse Jewish backgrounds," Canadian Young Judaea informed parents and teens in a recent letter.

Canadian Young Judaea will join North American groups United Synagogue Youth, Masada Israel Programs, NELFTY (North East Lakes Federation of Temple Youth), American Young Judaea and Ramah Camps for Ma'apilim. Two dozen Italian Jewish teens will take part in the program along with the 600 North American youth, including 80 Canadians.

Deadline for application is May 15. The program runs from June 27 to Aug. 8. A $4,850 fee includes travel expenses, food and acccommodations. For further information contact Canadian Young Judaea at (416) 781-5156 in Toronto, (514) 735-3167 in Montreal, (604) 263-1200 in Vancouver, (902) 422-7491 in Halifax or (403) 487-0585 in Edmonton.

Former Likud minister brands talks with PLO 'a mistake'

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If news reports from Israel are any indication, it's not a matter of whether Israel will hand over control of Gaza and Jericho to the PLO, it's just a question of when.

The time when the Jewish state refused to talk with the PLO seems eons past, but several hundred listeners at a recent lecture at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue were reminded that for years, Israel's government took a different tack when dealing with the Palestinian problem.

Moshe Arens, Israel's hawkish former foreign and defence minister, expressed the Likud Party's position that it is "a mistake" fraught with danger to deal with the PLO.

Israel should not negotiate with undemocratic Arab interlocutors, whether they are from the PLO or neighboring governments, he said, since any finely-tuned agreement could turn into a mere scrap of paper should a new Arab dictatorship take over.

Speaking as part of the Issues and Insights lecture series presented by the new leadership group of the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, Arens said the current negotiations with the PLO will inevitably lead to a Palestinian state abutting Israel's pre-1967 borders. And a PLO state that is undemocratic will always prove dangerous for Israel, he asserted.

The Arab world consists of "despotisms tempered by assassination," he said. Changes in government could mean abrogation of any peace agreement. Arens, who opposed the Camp David accords, said that should Muslim fundamentalists take over Egypt, the "cold peace" with that Arab neighbor will be in jeopardy.

Turning his attention to Syria, Arens said Hafez al-Assad will settle for nothing less than complete return of the Golan Heights — a price that is too high for Israel to pay.

Israel's best chance for peace would be through negotiations with democratically-elected Arab governments. Only that would give Israel the certainty that a treaty will hold and that any concessions it gives will not be in vain, he said.

Asked in an interview what his prescription for peace with the Palestinians would be, he pointed to the Likud's longstanding policy that calls for talks with elected Palestinian representatives, not the PLO.

There is no consensus in Israel over negotiating with the PLO or on relinquishing Judea and Samaria, he added, even though it appears Israel is heading down that path. Only a democratic Palestinian state that respects the rights of individuals, tolerates minorities and is non-violent would be tolerable for Israel.

Arens, who served as ambassador to Washington before joining the cabinet, said he left politics because "I was a great believer in national service, not national servitude. I didn't believe in a lifetime sentence."

He currently serves as vice-chair of the board of the Israeli Corporation, one of Israel's largest investment companies with holdings in container companies, oil refineries, cable television companies and firms that provide educational software.

Educator shoots down 'sacred cows'

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — British religious educator, writer and broadcaster Clive Lawton took aim at what he described as Jewish education's three "sacred cows" in his keynote address to the seventh National Jewish Education Conference last Sunday morning.

The conference, which was held April 16-18 at Winnipeg's Westin Hotel, was entitled Education and Tradition, but the emphasis was on Jewish continuity.

Co-sponsored by the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canadian Zionist Federation, the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba and the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education, the conference drew speakers from across Canada to address the 310 delegates on the issues confronting educators in the Jewish school system.

Lawton's first salvo was against Shoah education; he said we have to stop memorializing the past and be more positive. "The remarkable thing is not that we suffered but rather that a powerless people survived despite the sheer savagery and technology," he said.

At the same time, he scorned the "spurious" link often made between the Holocaust and the creation of the State of Israel as an "insult to God," noting that Israel was on its way into being anyway.

The second "holy cow" Lawton criticized was the Israel experience. A single visit by a young British Jew to Israel is no more meaningful than a holiday in Spain, he suggested. There needs to be a second, third and fourth visit before the experience becomes valuable in promoting a Jewish identity.

The third attack was on the idea that the ideal period for Jewish education is the teen years. "The key loss to the community is at the young adult level," he said. "That's when people are determining their life's course. What do we as a community do for them?"

With the world's endangered Jewish communities (in the former Soviet Union, Syria, Ethiopia) for the most part no longer in immediate danger, "What are we as Jews fighting for?"

Lawton asked. "Mere survival isn't enough. We need a raison d'etre."

The answer, he suggested, is in our history and traditions. "We make the past real in our daily lives," he said. "At Pesach, we experience the exodus from Egypt. At Tisha b'Av, we sit and mourn the destruction of the Temple. At Sukkot, we sit in booths. At Shavuot, we sit up all night to receive the Torah. We can keep our history alive and own it.

"The problem is that with our newfound freedom and independence over the last 50 years, we have forgotten to count the omer. Liberty has become licence...

"We have a rich Jewish culture," he said. "We need to find the trigger that will set Jewish spirits aflame with the desire to learn it again.

"We teach our young how to be Jewish. Maybe it is time to teach them why they should be Jewish!"

Addressing the delegates that evening, Lawton expanded on this idea, stressing that we have to inspire our children with our own behavior, practice and ethical standards.

"Did we all bench after supper tonight?" he asked. "What would a group of Grade 6 students have seen and heard if they were there?

"Many of us live Jewish lives vicariously through our children," he charged. " The message we are sending them is that being Jewish is childish, not for adults, that it can be discarded when they grow up."

Following a screening of the documentary, Surviving Freedom filmed by Alan Echenberg of Montreal and profiling the Jewish communities of Ottawa and Peterborough, Lawton noted that smaller communities are "people-sized."

He said "The challenge facing the Jewish communities of Toronto and Montreal is to break themselves down into bite-sized units so that people will feel they belong."

Concerns of young Jews must be addressed, leaders say

WINNIPEG — How can we convince young Jewish adults to choose to live a Jewish life in a free multicultural society?

In separate addresses, two Canadian Jewish leaders discussed the pressing issue of Jewish continuity at the seventh National Education Conference in Winnipeg last week.

Professor Irving Abella, national president of the Canadian Jewish Congress and Aaron Brotman, vice-president of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and chair of Toronto's task force on Jewish continuity, assimilation and intermarriage, both stressed that young Jews have the same concerns and desire to belong as their non-Jewish peers; and when they leave home, the Jewish link is often severed.

Responding to the address of keynote speaker British educator Clive Lawton, Brotman expressed his view that Canadian Jewish leaders have to start listening more to young adults, that Jewish learning should be life long, that parents should be role models for their children in terms of Jewish practices, that the connection with Israel should be strengthened and that synagogues have an important role to play.

And if the issue of continuity is properly addressed, he said, more funding will be needed.

Although Abella stressed that support for Israel, commemorating the Holocaust and fighting anti-Semitism remain Jewish priorities, he called for a positive, exciting vision for the future to inspire and create new leadership for the 21st century. — M.L.

There's more to continuity than school, says Witty

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Only the home, school, synagogue and community working together can lead children to a lifetime of Jewish commitment and practice. There would then be no worries about Jewish continuity, said Rabbi Irwin Witty, Executive Director of the Board of Jewish Education of Toronto.

"The Canadian Jewish community is concerned about continuity," he said. "But there are no quick fixes. Unfortunately, the school is expected to do it all alone. The school is supposed to replace the parents. The results are ignorance, indifference, alienation, intermarriage and conversion."

Rabbi Witty was addressing the second plenary of the seventh National Jewish Education Conference in Winnipeg.

Rabbi Witty identified characteristics of current Jewish education (including its role as a a transmitter of Jewish ritual literacy). He referred to the limited number of Jewish experiences offered; the unspoken assumption on the part of many parents that their children won't come out of school more Jewish than they themselves are; isolation from other supporting influences or role models; and the assumption that the children will come out with some kind of Jewish identity from the mere fact of going to Jewish school rather than what they may have learned.

The school can teach the core knowledge of literature, language and how to decode the prayer books, he noted, but educating Jewish children is too important to leave to the schools alone.

Looking to the future of Jewish education in Canada, Rabbi Witty identified six areas that need to be strengthened:

- Capable, dedicated, charismatic teachers have to be attracted to the system, perhaps through a scholarship program.
- Community leaders must reorder their priorities and provide more funding and volunteer time to education.
- There should be an aggressive campaign to recruit and retain Jewish children in the Jewish school system. Rabbi Witty noted, for example, that only 50 per cent of Jewish school age children in Toronto attend Jewish schools, down from 57 per cent 15 to 20 years ago.

"The numbers have increased but the percentage has shrunk," he said. "A major part of the effort should be in-reach — correcting what may be wrong in the system and encouraging children to continue through high school."

- A variety of educational and Jewish experiences must be offered including visits to Israel, camps, youth programs and lifelong learning opportunities; it must be explained to young Jews what is unique about being Jewish and why they should remain Jews.
- Smaller communities must provide Israel experiences, in-depth Jewish learning during school breaks and perhaps a national boarding school program for Jewish junior and senior high school students from those communities.
- "A massive infusion of funds is going to be needed over a period of years for Jewish education to be more effective whether through endowment funds or UJA and UIA appeals ... It is the only realistic approach."

Responding to Rabbi Witty were Jerry Cohen, principal of Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate (JWC), Winnipeg's Jewish high school and Prof. Martin Lockshin of York University.

Cohen spoke of a JWC program which answers some of Rabbi Witty's challenges by offering a yearly Jewish Awareness Retreat run by Yeshiva University students from New York, student conducted Shabbat services in different synagogues around the city and a quality teaching staff.

"Jewish education on its own is not enough to attract students," he observed. "We must also provide a top notch general program to go with our first rate Talmud program and the extracurricular activities such as musicals, drama and championship sports teams."

Lockshin talked about teacher education and his university's program where teachers qualifying for the Jewish school system also receive training through a cooperative arrangement with the Jewish community.

Endowment funds credited for helping Jewish education

WINNIPEG — There are currently $29 billion in endowment funds in North America, which paid $500 million to beneficiaries last year, according to David Cohen, executive director of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba.

"Endowment funds are the best way to help Jewish schools with funding on an ongoing basis," Cohen told the audience at the seventh National Jewish Education Conference in Winnipeg.

Cohen was speaking as part of a panel on the future of funding of Jewish schools. Other members of the panel were Martin Buchwald, a founding member of the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education and Toronto's Bernie Farber, national director of community relations for the Canadian Jewish Congress, who both spoke about government funding for Jewish education in Canada. The panel was chaired by conference chair Rocky Pollack.

Noting that the foundation provided $10,000 for the conference, Cohen said: "We see ourselves as partners in Jewish education in Winnipeg and on the Canadian scene."

Cohen explained that in an endowment fund the principle is held in trust and invested by a charitable foundation. The interest only is distributed yearly.

One of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba's funds, for example, is the Jewish Educational Trust Fund which last year provided $40,000 for special projects in Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education schools.

"Endowments offer an opportunity to honor someone in perpetuity," Cohen said.

He encouraged schools, however, to work with existing community foundations rather than start new organizations.

Farber spoke about the ongoing struggle in Ontario to persuade the government to fund private religious schools in view of the fact that the province already funds private Catholic schools.

Buchwald described provincial government funding for Jewish education in other provinces. In British Columbia, separate schools receive 50 per cent of what public schools receive while their Alberta counterparts receive 75 per cent. In Quebec, under the new Education Act, the figure is still 52 per cent.

In Manitoba, the block grant to private schools has been frozen at 63.5 per cent of public school funding for the last two years although the government hopes to move that figure up to 80 per cent eventually, although government funding to schools in general is being reduced. One option Winnipeg's Jewish community has that is not available anywhere else is a Hebrew language program in the public school system.

"Jewish schools are also unique in that parents can receive a federal tax deduction," Buchwald noted.

Witman receives Sam Filer Award

WINNIPEG — Noach Witman, 90, is the oldest active member of the Jewish community in Western Canada and most likely the oldest active member of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

Witman was honored with the Sam Filer Award at a CJC reception on April 17 during the seventh National Jewish Education Conference in Winnipeg.

A prominent Winnipeg broadcaster, editor and journalist — and Western Canada's premier Yiddishist — Witman received the award for his significant contribution to the community through the media.

Marjorie Blankstein, a past national officer and chair of the Manitoba region of CJC and past president of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council, presented the award to Witman, who accepted "with humility and pleasure."

"Since the 1930s, I have never missed one session of Congress," Witman said. "I thank you all from the bottom of my heart."

Speaking partly in Yiddish, Witman chastised Jewish education for not emphasizing more Yiddish learning.

"You should teach Yiddish in all Jewish schools," he said. "That is how to fight assimilation!"

B.C. campus programs draw young Jews

'Critical issue'

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Vancouver may seem to some as a black hole where Jewish young people from across the country move and disappear, but this is not true, said Zack Kaye, executive director of Hillel at the University of British Columbia (UBC).

Kaye was moderator of a panel on the Forgotten Generation: 18 to 30-year-olds, at the seventh National Jewish Education Conference held recently in Winnipeg.

Panelist Mark Blumberg, co-president of the UBC Jewish Student Association at Hillel and co-chair of the Jewish Law Students Association reinforced Kaye's comments about their success in increasing the participation of Jewish students on two B.C. campuses.

Lisa Singer of Saskatoon who is now a graduate student at the University of Manitoba spoke from the perspective of a student from a small Jewish community attending a campus with few Jewish students.

The final speaker on the panel was Wendy Eisen of Toronto, CJC national co-chair of Jewish Education and Continuity. Eisen spoke of her pain as a parent watching her children interdating.

Kaye began by telling the packed room, "We are coming up with some answers to the critical issues that North American Jewish communities are wrestling with on college campuses." He noted that, under his direction, paid Hillel membership at UBC has grown from 30 to 245 (since 1990) with another 200 students and young adults in the Vancouver area who also participate.

Kaye provided some examples of what can be done to attract Jewish university students to Jewish programs and organizations. One of the first practices he introduced was that of phoning students on a weekly basis.

"We had a list of 600 names on our mailing list," he said, "but a lot of the letters kept coming back. We scrapped Canada Post. It's those phone calls, that persistence week in and week out that show people we care."

At Simon Fraser University, he noted, he used to have just two Jewish student contacts. Now there is an organized group of 45 who have just elected their own board of directors.

Blumberg was one of the participants in a new program called From Anguish To Hope co-founded by Kaye. Modeled on the March of the Living, the program took 43 university students, many of them from UBC, to Poland and Israel last summer.

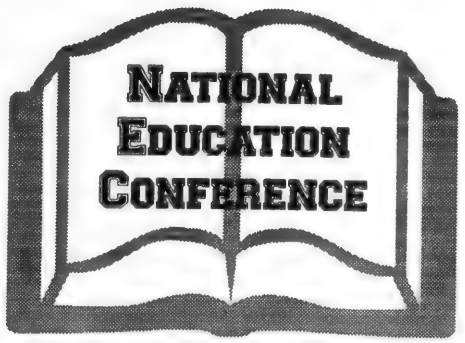
Blumberg noted that since 85 per cent of Jewish students earn university degrees, college campuses are ideal locations to promote Jewish leadership and involvement at a time when many young people are about to make their life's choices.

The ingredients for success, he suggested, are the right location (the UBC Hillel is in the middle of campus), a good professional staff (UBC Hillel has three), the involvement of lay people from off campus, adequate community funding for programs, resources and peridocals. He said the Jewish community at large could be most helpful by pressing for academic courses with Jewish content and more Jewish identity programming and by helping students who want to experience Israel.

The Jewish Student Association at the University of Saskatchewan numbered just 25 students, or 85 per cent of Jewish students on campus, when Singer was there.

Rather than deal with issues in the wider Jewish world, she said, programs were built around Shabbat dinners and Sunday bagel brunches before major holidays. Equally important are Jewish Awereness programs for the campus as a whole.

"We tried to remain an active group with visibility on campus," Singer said. "The Saskatoon Jewish community is very supportive. They are seeing too many of their young leaving the community or assimilating."



Eisen wanted to understand why she sees her children interdating despite her having given them the best Jewish upbringing she could. After much research, she said, she found her answers.

Although Canada's Jewish population has increased to 360,000, she noted, we have the highest average age and lowest birth rate of any other ethnic or religious group in the country.

Of greater danger paradoxically, she said, echoing the opinions of other speakers at the conference, is that all the barriers are down. Canadian Jews can live and work anywhere they desire and associate with almost anyone they want, with little concern about anti-Semitism.

Her proposed remedies included scholarships for some children to attend Jewish day schools; more funding for Jewish programs and staff on campuses (she noted that of 17 campuses which had students participate on From Anguish To Hope, only Kaye at UBC did any follow-up); and that rabbis, federations and Congress work together to make Judaism more attractive and relevant to liberal, western educated, cosmopolitan young Jews and their issues.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

HUTTER — SCHNEE — SHNIER

Helen Drutz, of Toronto, was born a Hutter to parents who emanated from Austria.

Unfortunately, there are ten municipalities in Austria which may have yielded the surname Hutter, including Hutte, Huttau, Hutten and Hutting to mention a few. It will require more detailed information (such as nearby cities or towns) to pinpoint the target.

Her inquiry about Schnee is easier. Although Schnee is the Jewish word for snow, the name derives from Schneyer, a given Jewish name which surprisingly comes from the Latin — Senior. My friend, Irving Shneir, the talented raconteur is a "senior" citizen.

Touvier verdict praised by French community

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

VERSAILLES — The conviction here last week of Nazi collaborator Paul Touvier signals that France may finally be ready to confront its wartime past.

Some 23 years ago, then French President Georges Pompidou pardoned Touvier on charges of committing war crimes with the explanation that France should bury the period of its history when the Vichy government supported the Nazi program for the extermination of the Jews.

But last week, concluding a trial that lasted little over a month, a jury took 5-½ hours to reach the verdict that Touvier, 79, was guilty of crimes against humanity. He was given the maximum sentence of life imprisonment.

Nearly 50 years after committing the deeds for which he was tried, Touvier has become the first Frenchman to be convicted of crimes against humanity.

The majority of the French population was in favor of bringing Touvier to trial. More than 64 per cent of those recently polled supported the idea, saying it would help shed light on this dark period of French history.

The verdict was greeted with relief by the French Jewish community.

Jean Kahn, head of CRIF, the umbrella organization representing French Jewry, said he was "totally satisfied with the outcome of the trial. This was not the trial of Vichy, like some people have said, but the trial of one of the smaller wheels of the collaboration."

Three other Frenchmen have been charged with crimes against humanity, but their cases never went to trial.

Rene Bousquet, Vichy's police chief between 1942 and 1944, was charged with the deportation of 2,000 Jewish children. But before he could stand trial, he was killed by a deranged gunman last June at the age of 82.

Jean Leguay, who was indicted in 1979 for organizing the first mass roundup of French Jews in 1942, died of natural causes in 1989 at the age of 79.

Maurice Papon, a senior official in wartime Bordeaux, has so far managed to evade trial with a series of legal maneuvers. Papon, who served as Paris police chief in the 1960s and was a cabinet member in the 1970s, is now 83 and may never come before a court.

But Kahn said Papon should be brought to trial, because he was "much more important than Touvier." He pointed out that Papon ordered the deportation of hundreds of Jews from the Bordeaux region, "which was not even occupied by the German army."

"I do regret that there will be no Bousquet trial," he added, "because Bousquet was the one responsible for the arrest of Jews in France. I still cannot understand how Bousquet was so conveniently suppressed so close to his trial."

Kahn added that he was totally opposed to the idea of "erasing history."

"Given the crimes committed by those people, how can anyone speak of erasing the memory of what they did? The unique circumstances of the Holocaust forbid us from holding such a view."

French Nazi-hunter Serge Klarsfeld expressed bitterness at the current French government's handling of the Vichy period.

Noting that President Francois Mitterrand has remained lenient toward officials of the Vichy regime, Klarsfeld said, "Mitterrand has a different vision of Vichy than the one Jewish families have. We see in Vichy a government that decided to send the police after Jews all through France and who wrought havoc in our lives.

"The leniency of the French president is not a surprise for us. He has expressed it on various occasions, and we had to oppose it, as in the Bousquet case.

"Mitterrand joined the Vichy regime in 1942, a collaborationist and anti-Semitic regime. He left this regime to join the Resistance, but he'd rather have these years of the beginning of his career not mentioned anymore in the courts," said Klarsfeld.

The jury at the Versailles Court of Justice convicted Touvier for his role in the assassination of seven Jewish hostages in Rillieux-la-Pape, located near Lyon in southeastern France, on June 29, 1944.

Henri Glaser, son of Leon Glaser, one of the seven Jewish hostages ordered killed by Paul Touvier, testified at Touvier's trial. [RNS Photo/Reuters]

At the time, Touvier was local head of the intelligence service of the militia, the 30,000-member collaborationist civilian armed force created by the Vichy regime.

The killings of the Jewish hostages were in reprisal for the murder the day before by the Resistance of Vichy Propaganda Minister Philippe Henriot.

Touvier admitted that he personally picked the seven Jewish hostages who were killed in retaliation.

After liberation, Touvier was arrested and held at the Paris police headquarters from where he mysteriously escaped. Condemned twice to death in absentia for his numerous war crimes, he went into hiding.

It was discovered later that he was helped by numerous members of the Catholic Church in France, some of them belonging to the highest ranks of the Catholic hierarchy.

Because of the statute of limitations for war crimes — a charge different from that of crimes against humanity, which has no statute of limitations — Touvier reappeared in his hometown of Chambery, located near Lyon, in 1970.

He requested a pardon from President Pompidou who, it was widely believed, despised the Resistance. Pompidou obliged in 1971.

Aware of the scandalous implications of his pardon, the French president requested that his decision not be printed in the official state publication where all laws and decrees are published.

Despite that, a few months later, Pompidou's decision was discovered by a group of former Resistance members from the Lyon area.

The outrage was immediate, and Touvier was tracked down by a French reporter. Touvier's picture appeared in the large-circulation weekly L'Express, triggering a wave of protests against Pompidou's pardon.

Instead of trying to defuse the scandal, Pompidou attempted to justify his action by saying it was time for the French to cast a veil over this period of history "when Frenchmen didn't like each other."

Touvier, in a letter to a Catholic priest, revealed that he was the one who had picked the seven Jewish hostages murdered in Rillieux-la-Pape.

The letter, which was published by the press, then prompted relatives of the victims to sue Touvier for crimes against humanity, a charge for which pardons do not apply.

Touvier went back into hiding in various convents and monasteries until he was discovered by the French police in a monastery near Nice in 1989.

During the five-week trial, the French media provided extensive coverage of the proceedings. As a result, the generations born after World War II discovered to what extent the government that ruled France from 1940 to 1945 was collaborationist and anti-Semitic.

Jews return to Shanghai honoring city's war efforts

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SHANGHAI — Jews returned to this Chinese port city last week to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the haven from Nazi persecution they were given.

In a ceremony held in pouring rain, the city of Shanghai honored the approximately 20,000 Jews who fled Europe and survived the Holocaust.

Because Shanghai was a free port — one of the few cities in the world that did not demand visas or travel papers — it became a sanctuary for Jewish refugees from Hitler's Europe.

During World War II, the Jews were kept under armed Japanese guard in the occupied city, in a bombed-out slum known as the Hongkew Ghetto. Most Jewish property was confiscated but Jews were free to leave the area during the day and could apply for three-month work papers.

The Japanese had rounded up the Jews to assuage their Nazi wartime allies but refused a German demand to carry out the "Final Solution" there.

Among the Jews who found haven in Shanghai were the students and faculty of the Mir Yeshiva, near Grodno in the present Belarus.

Others came from Germany, Austria and Poland. Fleeing Russian Jews found brethren who had fled the 1917 Bolshevik uprising against the Czar.

Some Jewish refugees remained in Shanghai for up to 10 years before they left for the United States, Israel or other countries. Others, mainly the elderly, never left, and lived out their days under the Chinese Communists.

Today there is no longer a Jewish community in Shanghai.

One Chinese official attending the ceremony said that the people of Shanghai "will never forget the role of Jews in helping to build our city."

At the ceremony, China's first-ever memorial to Holocaust victims was unveiled by Huang Yuejin, mayor of the Hongkou District People's Government. The bronze and stone memorial is inscribed in Chinese, Hebrew and English.

An orchestra, composed entirely of women, played Hebrew and Yiddish songs.

Attending the ceremony was Rabbi Arthur Schneier of the Park East Synagogue in New York, a Holocaust survivor and head of the ecumenical group Appeal of Conscience.

Under the foundation's auspices, Rabbi Schneier helped organize the memorial with Chinese officials and led a group of about 60 survivors to China for the events.

The group visited the sites of their former synagogues, including the Ohel Rachel, which now serves as headquarters of the Shanghai Board of Education. A Torah Ark still stands in the former sanctuary room, which is otherwise empty.

The group also took part in a seminar about the Jews of Shanghai with local scholars.

"We are here today in an act of thanksgiving to the people of Shanghai who, despite their hard life during the Japanese occupation, welcomed the tired and hunted newcomers clinging to life," Rabbi Schneier said in a speech.

"We salute the Chinese people, who have been immune to the scourge of anti-Semitism. And we voice our gratitude for the friendship of the American and Chinese peoples and for the newly established bonds between the People's Republic of China and the State of Israel."

Israel and China established diplomatic relations in 1992, although China still maintains its traditional alliances in the Arab world.

Pan Guang, dean of Shanghai's Institute for Sino-Judaic Studies, who helped organized the ceremony, said the self-rule accord between Israel and the PLO helped pave the way for the ceremony.

Among the Jews who found haven in Shanghai and attended the ceremonies were Yehuda Halevi, now executive vice president of Bar-Ilan University in Ramat Gan; David Zysman, vice president of Yeshiva University in New York; and two New York businessmen engaged in trade with China, Benjamin Fishoff and Joseph Granger.

Other former Shanghai Jewish residents came to mark the anniversary from Austria, England, France and Israel.

The Door's Over There: Russian ultranationalist leader Vladimir Zhirinovsky gestures to a chassidic Jew during his recent stormy visit to Strasbourg. [RNS Photo/Reuters]

Zhirinovsky denounces reports about his Jewish background

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Back on Russian soil after a raucous trip to France, ultranationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky denounced reports that he is half-Jewish at a rambling news conference here last week.

He spurned documents discovered by the Associated Press in his birthplace, Almaty, Kazakhstan, describing them as a "forgery" and a "fabrication."

Public records published by the AP show that Zhirinovsky's mother married a Jewish man named Volf Eidelshtein and that her son used the name Eidelshtein until he changed it to Zhirinovsky when he was 18.

Rumors that Zhirinovsky has a Jewish heritage continue to dog him. Earlier reports had it that he was once granted an exit visa for Israel.

According to local news reports, Zhirinovsky's news conference was filled with anti-Semitic remarks and condemnations of "Zionists."

This month, while Zhirinovsky was in Strasbourg to address the Council of Europe, he lost his temper when about 100 Jewish students demonstrated against him in front of the Russian consulate.

Television cameras showed him grabbing small bushes from the consulate's garden and throwing them at the demonstrators. He reportedly also spat at the demonstrators and threatened to use a "nuclear gun" against them.

Referring to that incident during the news conference, Zhirinovsky said sarcastically, "A group of Jews in Strasbourg can attack any deputy of the Russian Parliament. That's possible, that's democracy. Full freedom for Jews in Strasbourg — and Russian diplomats and deputies have to keep silent."

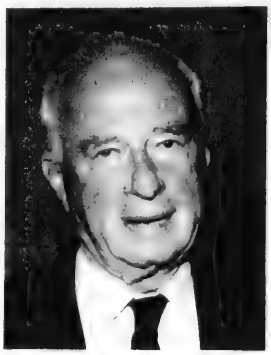
Zhirinovsky also lashed out at the possibility that Russia would agree to an associate membership in NATO under the Partnership for Peace program.

At the news conference, Zhirinovsky referred to that program as a "vile document."

He also said that Russia should not join the Council of Europe — whose members include 32 nations from Western, Central and Eastern Europe — because it is a "pro-NATO, pro-Zionist, pro-American organization."

Rabin met by festive gathering

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency



Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin

MOSCOW — The throng of Russian Jews standing outside Moscow's famed Arkipova Synagogue evoked emotionally charged memories of a different era, one associated with refuseniks and demonstrations of the pre-glasnost period.

But when Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was greeted by more than 1,000 Jews inside and outside the synagogue last Sunday, that era seemed far away. The gathering looked more like a spring carnival than a political demonstration.

A dozen youths, wearing Jewish Agency hats and sweatshirts, danced to taped Hebrew music blaring over the public address system outside the synagogue. Some waved Israeli flags as Rabin's limousine drove up.

Rabin emerged and shook a few hands. Many hundreds were left outside, however, as the crowd pushed into the synagogue to glimpse the first Israeli prime minister ever to visit the former Soviet Union.

In his address, Rabin saluted the determination of Soviet Jews. "It is right that an Israeli prime minister's first stop in Russia begins at the synagogue in Moscow," he said. "You succeeded in overcoming obstacles. We accompanied your struggle, doing whatever we could.

"Now your relatives have homes in Karmiel, Upper Nazareth, and Tel Aviv. Many have even come home to the same Jerusalem you dreamed of. Not all have had it economically easy, but they have come home."

But Moscow Chief Rabbi Pinchas Goldschmidt took issue with Rabin's message, suggesting that bolstering Jewish education should be a top priority, and not just immigrating to Israel.

"Unfortunately, Israel is now in third place for Russian Jews who seek to emigrate, after the U.S. and Germany," Rabbi Goldschmidt said. He stressed that if there is going to be a reawakened interest in Israel, "We must first strengthen Jewish education in the Diaspora."

Jews standing outside the synagogue expressed down-to-earth views, a mix of concerns and hopes.

Vika Shazgozodsky, a 40-something Moscow woman, pointed to her 15-year-old daughter, Natasha, who was about to join a three-year Jewish Agency-sponsored high school program in Israel. "We hear it is a bad situation with the Arabs. I'm afraid about my daughter going there," she said.

Nathaniel Beginov, a 50-ish Bukharan businessman living in Moscow, said, "I have visited Israel five times, but the best place to live is where you have work ... I would come [to Israel] when I retire."

Alexander Stotsky, director of a building company in Moscow, said he is considering immigrating to Israel, "but I don't like his [Rabin's] friendship with Arafat. I would like to know how Rabin will get out of this corner."

A handful of those gathered were seen brandishing anti-Rabin government bumper stickers.

A sticker reading "The people are with Golan" was pasted on the synagogue window. When Rabin emerged from the synagogue, several held up black-and yellow Chabad bumper stickers reading, "The land of Israel is in danger," and yelled out "traitor!"

During his four-day visit, which included a stopover in St. Petersburg, Rabin was scheduled to meet with Russian President Boris Yeltsin, Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin, Foreign Minister Andrei Kozyrev and other Russian officials to discuss the Middle East peace process.

In October 1991, Israel and the former Soviet Union re-established diplomatic ties that were severed by the Soviets following the 1967 Six-Day War.

Rabin's visit comes shortly after a similar visit to Moscow by PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat and at a time when Russia is seeking to play a more active role in the peace process.

The meetings are part of Russia's attempt to increase its diplomatic clout in the international arena, including the Middle East peace talks, which it has co-sponsored with the United States as more of a junior partner.

Rabin has said he also intends to talk with Russian officials about the immigration of Russian Jews to Israel.

Accord nears completion

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A final agreement for implementing the Palestinian self-rule accord in the Gaza Strip and Jericho may be concluded by the end of this week, according to Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

Speaking last Sunday with reporters at Ben-Gurion Airport as Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin took off for a four-day trip to Russia, Peres said it was "possible but by no means certain" that an agreement could be arrived at in Cairo by the close of this week's talks.

But at the weekly cabinet meeting held in Jerusalem shortly afterward, Peres warned that any further delays in reaching a final agreement could lead to an unraveling of the entire peace process.

"If we don't finish it all within the next 10 days, the whole process may come to nothing," Peres was reported to have told his colleagues.

Police Minister Moshe Shahal later explained that Peres "was describing the mood of the Palestinians, the problems they are facing, because of the erosion (of popular support) caused by the prolonged talks."

Peres returned to Israel Saturday night after holding five meetings with PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat in Bucharest.

He told reporters that he and Arafat had resolved several of the issues holding up the signing of a final agreement in Cairo.

But Peres added that a number of issues — including the jurisdiction of Palestinian courts, passports, currency and telephones — still remained to be resolved.

Peres and Arafat were expected to meet again soon in Cairo in an effort to clear up those issues, but no decision on when they would meet was expected until Rabin returns from Moscow later this week.

The first Israeli prime minister ever to visit Russia, Rabin set off for Moscow at a time when the Russians are seeking to play a more active role in the peace process.

In Paris, meanwhile, Finance Minister Avraham Shohat was more optimistic than he had been last week about the progress of meetings being held in the French capital to discuss economic aspects of the Palestinian self-rule accord.

The list of disagreements is fast diminishing, said Shohat, who heads the Israeli delegation to those talks.

Last week, Shohat said Palestinian demands to trade with companies that engage in "dumping" practices — selling their goods at lower than usual prices — could bring the Paris negotiations to a standstill.

The News in Brief

OK For Junior High Granted

EDMONTON — This city's public school board has given the Edmonton Talmud Torah permission to operate a junior high school program (grades 7 through 9) beginning with the 1994-95 school year.

Twenty students are expected to enroll in the first grade 7 class.

As the current elementary school is full, the board will provide a free-standing portable classroom for the next year. But the Talmud Torah board has been told that permission to operate the junior high school would be revoked unless the board can find a new location.

The Talmud Torah board has assured parents that a solution will be found in time for the following year.

Pollard Pessimistic on Parole

TORONTO — The following statement from Jonathan Pollard was transmitted to media recently, in response to U.S. President Clinton's refusal to grant him clemency and statements from various quarters that he will be eligible for parole in 1995:

"My parole eligibility is not relevant. At the present time, I stand no chance of being released in 1995. Firstly, the sentencing judge endorsed [former U.S. Defence Secretary] Caspar Weinberger's position that I should never be released.

"Secondly, the prosecuting attorney, Joseph Di Genova, made a public statement that I should never again see the light of day.

"Thirdly, the president has now stated his support for the intelligence community's prejudicial and fraudulent damage assessment of my case.

"With all this stacked against me, it is virtually inconceivable that any parole board would release me in the near future."

No Action Against Goren

JERUSALEM — Israel's attorney general has told the High Court of Justice that he will take no action against former Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Shlomo Goren, who has called on Israeli soldiers to refuse to obey any orders that call for the evacuation of Jews from settlements.

Private citizens had petitioned the High Court to order the government to act against Rabbi Goren, who had said that his call to the soldiers was based on Halachah.

Attorney General Michael Ben-Yair told the court that the government's policy was one of restraint, in pursuit of which he did not want to prevent the free expression of opinion.

Ben-Yair admitted that Rabbi Goren's statements represented an infringement of the law.

But the attorney general added that because of the sensitive nature of the rabbi's ruling, there seemed no point in pursuing it through the courts when the Israeli government had not yet called for the settlers' evacuation.

Rabbi Rosen Suffers Strokes

BUCHAREST — Romania's Chief Rabbi, Moses Rosen, has suffered two strokes and is being treated at a Bucharest hospital, Jewish groups here have reported.

The strokes have left the 81-year-old rabbi partially paralyzed on his left side. The chief doctor at the Elias Hospital in the Romanian capital said Rabbi Rosen was in stable condition but would make no predictions because of the patient's advanced age.

Rabbi Rosen, who has been chief rabbi of Romania since 1948, has wielded an extraordinary amount of influence, both as a religious leader and as a frequent ambassador to the United States on behalf of Romania.

He enabled nearly the entire postwar Jewish community of Romania, about 400,000, to immigrate to Israel, an exodus unique in Communist Eastern Europe.

He has also maintained a strong Jewish religious and cultural life throughout Romania.

Hungary Commemorates Deportations

BUDAPEST — For the first time, Hungary held official ceremonies last week to commemorate the deportation of 600,000 Hungarian Jews to death camps during World War II.

Commemorative events began with a service at the Central Jewish Cemetery. Later, a ceremony sponsored by the World Jewish Congress was held at the Opera House here. Among those attending were Hungarian President Arpad Goncz.

Also in attendance was Shevach Weiss, the speaker of Israel's Knesset.

While in Budapest, Weiss met Prime Minister Peter Boross and Foreign Minister Geza Jeszensky. Boross laid a wreath at the Jewish cemetery, but both he and Jeszensky declined invitations to speak at the Opera House.

Agreement on Water

JERUSALEM — Israel's national water company, Mekorot, will continue to supply water to the Gaza Strip and Jericho after the Palestinians assume authority there, negotiators meeting in Cairo announced last week.

The Palestinians agreed to pay for Mekorot's services and have also undertaken to cooperate in safeguarding precious water resources in the region.

The water issue was one of the most serious challenges facing the committee negotiating the transfer of civilian authority to Palestinians in the self-rule areas.

Warsaw to Get Jewish School

WARSAW — For the first time in a generation, Warsaw will have a Jewish elementary school, starting next September.

The non-profit, private school will be established by the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation and called the Lauder-Morasha School. It will join schools sponsored by the foundation established in Budapest and Vienna.

The school will offer the basic requirements of Polish primary schools, as well as teach Hebrew, English, Jewish tradition and culture. There will also be classes in computers, music, fine arts, theatre arts and sports, as well as numerous after-school activities.

Estimates of the numbers of Jews in Poland today range from 10,000 to three or four times that number.

JAI Pushes For German Aliyah

JERUSALEM — The Jewish Agency for Israel has issued a statement encouraging aliyah from Germany.

The Agency estimates that between 4,000 and 5,000 Jews from the former Soviet Union will immigrate to Germany annually for the next few years. Since 1989, some 13,000 "Soviet" Jews have arrived in Germany, swelling the country's Jewish population to over 50,000.

Acting Agency chair Yehiel Leket noted that Germany has experienced "a worrying increase" in the number of violent racial and anti-Semitic attacks.

"The present reality in Germany is cause for concern and demands increased activity by the Jewish Agency to encourage aliyah from that country," Leket stated.

Queens Cemetery Desecrations

GREAT NECK, N.Y. — Jewish leaders have set up a fund to cover the cost of repairing a Jewish cemetery in Queens that was desecrated twice in 10 days earlier this month.

In cooperation with cemetery owners and volunteers, the Queens Jewish Council also has organized a May 1 cemetery clean-up day.

Sometime between April 1-4, vandals broke into the Bayside Cemetery in Queens and overturned approximately 50 headstones, opened coffins and damaged four mausoleums, said Queens police officials. The vandals left bones strewn throughout the cemetery.

Then, on April 12, vandals scrawled with magic marker anti-Semitic epithets like "kill Jews" and "hate Jews" on three mausoleums and one monument.

There have been no arrests and there are no suspects in the case, police said.

for Bloor to undertake its renewal program." Sarner said the Bloor branch has existed under a cloud for years with speculation that it would be sold to help pay the JCC's debts.

With the announcement of the new arrangement, a members' group will be able to launch a fundraising campaign to pay its share of the agency's debt and retain control and management of the property for the downtown Jewish community, he said.

Allan Wexler, chair of the Valley branch's management committee, said "anything that creates some kind of security is beneficial for the branch. Rumors that there is not going to be an agency (JCC) have hurt the Valley branch."

Ghert said "the federation's interest is to protect and preserve the community assets involved largely because there are many Jews involved in the use of these properties, some whose only contact with the Jewish community is through these agencies."

The JCC has been operating under a financial cloud since the late 1980s when several million dollars was spent to upgrade and expand the Bathurst Street branch, as well as construct a woman's health club at Bloor and repair the roof at the downtown location.

When the economy turned sour, the JCC could not collect on pledges and interest rates forced the debt skyward. The JCC now owes about $9.5 million to the Bank of Montreal, which has consented to the proposed arrangement. Last summer the JCC was unable to make the interest payments and it approached the federation for help. In addition to advancing funds that are normally allocated to the JCC for community programs, the federation advanced $400,000 from the community Endowment Fund and loaned the JCC an additional $250,000.

The federation ended those allocations over concerns there was no light at the end of that tunnel. Along with the JCC, it entered into negotiations with the Bank of Montreal, which holds mortgages on JCC property, to restructure the JCC's finances.

Here are other elements of the arrangement:

- the bank debt will be retired by payments of $4.5 million from the Bathurst branch, $3 million from the Bloor branch and $1 million from the Valley branch. Members' groups at the Bloor and Valley branches are planning fundraising campaigns to meet those targets. Sarner said the Bloor branch hopes to raise an additional $1 million to upgrade the facility.
- the remaining $1 million owed to the bank will be paid at a rate of $100,000 per year for five years with a final payment of $500,000.
- the federation is guaranteeing that $500,000 payment but is not responsible for any interest payments. Payment cannot be demanded prior to the five year term. The federation's right to nominate 50 percent plus one of the board of the new JCC (which links the new entities) subsists only so long as the JFGT is responsible for the guarantee.
- the Endowment Fund will lend an additional $1.4 million to help pay the JCC's other debts to suppliers. Of the amount, $400,000 has already been advanced.
- Perlmutter, Sarner and Wexler said it has yet to be determined whether memberships at the reconstituted JCC will overlap as they do now or whether only facility-specific memberships will be available in the future.
- according to Perlmutter, most JCCs in North America operate in buildings owned by the local federation.

Parizeau outlines his party's goals was built and is being built by anglophones," he said, receiving scattered applause.

As for the Jewish community, he singled out its contribution to the city's cultural life including music and arts. He thanked Michal Horenstein, a board member of the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts, who was in the audience.

Quebec, he said is enriched by people of diverse cultural origins and insisted that anyone who "wants to stay in Quebec and be a Quebecois" is a Quebecer.

Nevertheless, he made it clear that the PQ's goal is "gradual integration" into the francophone majority.

He noted that the latest data show 83 per cent of Quebecers' speak French at home, adding that they are not only "pure laine," but also, for example, Sephardi Jews and Haitians. He expressed confidence that more and more anglophones will live essentially in French.

He spoke with pride about two Jews who are seeking the PQ nomination in Outremont, and that Jewish candidates have been chosen for the PQ in Notre-Dame-de-Grace (Warren Saks) and D'Arcy McGee (Armand Essiminy).

"When Quebec is as French as the United States is English, or as Israel is Hebrew," Quebec will be better able to address the "complex" issue of individual rights.

In the meantime, Parizeau reassured the audience that Quebec is a "child of Western democracy" and subscribes to the notion of equality before the law and of rights.

Someone in the audience shouted "Comment?" [How?] after growing impatient with Parizeau's vague pronouncements on job opportunities for young people.

He said jobs in the public service, at both provincial and municipal levels, should be more accessible to minorities, but that he does not support setting numerical objectives.

"I say that more the better and as fast as possible. My commitment is in good faith.

"We must make the youth of the cultural communities believe they have a future in Quebec and that they can work here, whether in the public or private sector."

Parizeau then painted a rosy picture of an independent Quebec's economic possibilities. Increasing globalization has shown that even small countries can prosper in a free market, he said.

He outlined steps the PQ will take immediately toward sovereignty if it wins this autumn's election. A referendum can be expected eight to 10 months after it forms the government.

"The question will be very clear: 'Are you in favor of the Quebec government embarking on making Quebec a sovereign country?' "

At the conclusion of the plenary, Bernard stated that "the vast majority" of Quebec Jews are federalists — a statement for which he received sustained applause. Jews, at the same time, "not only accept the French fact, but support it.

"The Jewish community tends to view the issue in the context of human rights. We hope that Quebec will be an open, tolerant and pluralistic society, whatever the outcome of the election.

"We would like the question of national unity resolved once and for all, and soon."

Later, Bernard said he was encouraged by Parizeau's remarks on Jewish schools.

Bernard said he felt it was important for him to tell Parizeau that Jews are strongly federalist because it shows CJC "understanding and reflects the views of the Jewish community."

Premier backs federal system

The premier affirmed his commitment to the federalist system despite the fact that would entail sometimes "heated" discussions with Ottawa and the other provinces.

He said manpower training, for example, must remain under provincial jurisdiction.

"I don't think it's in our taxpayers' interest to see incursions into the Quebec field of manpower training because we will only be paying more taxes," he said.

However, Johnson said he has faith in the federalist system since "it is the one that provides the largest number of opportunities to make sure that we're full-fledged, influential members of North American society."

The premier praised the Jewish community for choosing Quebec as a place to live.

He was cagey about when he would call the election, which must be held by the end of November.

But he jokingly promised that it would not take place on a Saturday.

Rabbinical Reflections

By RABBI REUBEN POUPKO

And the son of an Israelite woman whose father was an Egyptian went out among the children of Israel; and this son of the Israelite woman and a man of Israel strove together in the camp. And the son of the Israelite women blasphemed the Name, and cursed; and they brought him unto Moses. (Leviticus XXIV, Verses 10-11.)

The above verses describe the only biblical account of blasphemy. The sages of the Midrash attempt to discover the roots of this crime. The purpose of the inquiry is not solely directed at determining the meaning of a biblical phrase or narrative, but has as its underlying goal an analysis of the causes of the abandonment of normative Jewish practice generally.

Three rabbis of the Midrash, all focusing on the same word, Vayetze "and he went out," come to radically different conclusions as to the origins of this event. Rabbi Hiyya, in answer to the question, "From where did he go out?" answers that he left the courtroom of Moses and blasphemed. Rabbi Hiyya explains that as his father was an Egyptian, he was denied residency rights. Among the tribes, the division of space was based on paternal inheritance. According to this view, the crime was generated by a perception of injustice. As Maimonides tells us, any legal system designed for the common good and for normative occurrences inevitably results in cases of unfairness.

Implicit in Rabbi Hiyya's explanation is a demand for compassion and understanding. Although he most certainly subscribes to the divinely mandated punishment, Rabbi Hiyya's commentary steers us away from a simplistic harsh condemnation. It is not contradictory to accept the imperative of severe justice, while at the same time understanding the painful human frailities that can cause so terrible a crime.

Rabbi Berehiah believes that a perception of injustice was not the cause of this event, but rather a posture of cynicism which led our anonymous blasphemer to his fate. Vayetze — he "went out" of the proceeding chapter, i.e. he mocked the ritual described just prior to this narrative. The ritual of the Shewbread demanded that bread be baked but not eaten until more than a week later, which inspired the blasphemer to comment, "Kings eat fresh bread." Rabbi Berehiah believes that major crimes evolve from a build-up of cynicism and disregard for that which is held sacred by a community. That seemingly insignificant ridicule of Jewish practices can lead to a violent rejection of Judaism as a whole.

Our third and concluding view is that of Rabbi Levi, who states simply that he went out of his world. Rabbi Levi understands Vayetze as describing his fate, not his origins. Because of his words, the blasphemer is condemned to leave his world. Rabbi Levi may believe that sin can be caused by many factors and forces, yet he rejects the inquiry as ultimately without purpose. Expending energy understanding sin, Rabbi Levi believes, can paralyse a society and strip it of the ability to sanction and punish.

The discussion of the Midrashic Rabbis is left unresolved.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko is the spiritual leader of Beth Israel Beth Aron Congregation in Montreal.

Lag b'Omer food favorites

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

I am by nature a city girl. Camping and backpacking sound like a lot of fun, but I'd rather not go any where my hair dryer and hot rollers are unwelcome.

The one exception to this rule is bonfires. I'll go anywhere for a bonfire. Hot dogs and marshmallows roasted over a barbecue grill or in a fireplace sort of loose their magic. That's why Lag b'Omer is such a great holiday. It's the only official bonfire of the year.

There are lots of historical reasons why we celebrate Lag b'Omer. It's a day to celebrate victory over our ancient enemies, a day to honor the memory of Rabbi Shimon Ben Yohai, the learned scholar who allegedly wrote the Zohar, and it's the day we can finally cut 3-year-old boys' hair!

To honor Rabbi Yohai's memory tens of thousands of Jews travel to Meron, an Israeli village near Safed, where he is said to be buried. Huge communal bonfires are lit, people sing, dance and generally celebrate until daybreak. I'm not such a party animal that I feel the need to stay up all night but I do enjoy a good get together.

Another reason Lag b'Omer is right up there with the rest of my favorite holidays is that making food to go along with a bonfire is simple and fast. Anything that lets me have friends over and doesn't take too much work is great. So grab those matches and let the party begin.

WHITE BEAN AND ARTICHOKE SALAD

3 cups well-drained cooked white beans
1 (8 oz.) can drained, quartered, artichoke hearts
⅔ cup diced sweet red peppers
⅓ cup chopped black olives
¼ cup chopped red onion
¼ cup chopped fresh parsley
1 tsp. dried mint
¾ tsp. dried basil
⅓ cup olive oil
¼ cup kosher red wine vinegar
Salt and pepper to taste

In a medium bowl, combine everything but the oil, vinegar, and salt and pepper. Combine the oil and vinegar and salt and pepper in a closed container and shake well. Pour dressing over salad and toss the salad. Cover and chill for several hours or overnight. Serve cold or at room temperature.

PECAN CRESCENTS

1 lb. salted butter
½ cup powdered sugar
4 cups chopped pecans
4 cups flour
2 tbsp. vanilla
2 tbsp. iced water

Cream butter. Add the powdered sugar and continue mixing. Gradually mix in the pecans and flour. Add the vanilla and ice water. Mix well. Refrigerate one hour. Roll pieces of dough into crescents and bake on lightly greased cookie sheet for 35 minutes at 350. Sift powdered sugar over cookies while still hot. No change for altitude.

PEACHY PUNCH

10 oz. frozen peach slices, partially thawed
6 oz. can frozen lemonade concentrate partially thawed
⅔ cup light rum
12 ice cubes

In a blender, combine peaches, concentrate and rum. Cover and blend 30 seconds. Add ice cubes one at a time and blend until slushy. Pour into a pitcher and garnish with fresh peaches or lemon slices. Serves 6.

Italian neo-fascists disavow anti-Semitism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Italians went to the polls last month and threw out the scoundrels, only to find that under a new electoral system they had elected an unprecedented number of neo-fascists to parliament.

Plainly fed up with the corruption and cronyism of past governments, disaffected Italians turned to the Freedom Alliance, a coalition grouping consisting of Silvi Berlusconi's Forza Italia, Umberto Bossi's Northern League — and Gianfranco Fini's National Alliance.

To the shock and consternation of many Italians, the National Alliance — the heir apparent to Benito Mussolini's Fascist party — won 105 of 366 seats in the lower house of parliament, three times the number it held two years ago.

With nearly 17 percent of the seats in parliament, the National Alliance has thus become a force to be reckoned with on the current Italian political scene.

Although the National Alliance has distanced itself from Mussolini's racist, anti-Semitic rhetoric, it is nevertheless a party of the far right, summoning up intimations of Italy's fascist past.

On the day after last month's election, several hundred neo-Nazi skinheads gathered in front of the National Alliance's headquarters in Rome and, in typical fascist fashion, marked the triumph with stiff-arm salutes.

Then, as if to add salt to the wound, Fini told the Turin daily La Stampa that he considered Mussolini "the greatest statesman of the century."

Despite this politically incorrect remark, Fini has gone to great lengths to portray the National Alliance as a responsible right-wing party. Indeed, ever since replacing Pino Rauti as leader three years ago, Fini, 43, has reined in the radicals and clarified the party's position on the Holocaust.

In addition to condemning anti-Semitism, Fini has described the Holocaust as "an error that led to horror." And on the eve of last month's election, he made a pilgrimage to the Ardeatine Caves near Rome, the site of a 1944 German massacre of more than 300 Italians, almost a quarter of whom were Jews.

With these amends, Fini has clearly polished the National Alliance's image. But lingering doubts remain, fed by its origins and, in the words of the World Jewish Congress, its "ambiguous relationship" with Italy's extremist skinhead movement.

The National Alliance emerged shortly after World War II, following the collapse of Mussolini's authoritarian regime. At the outset, Mussolini's Fascist party was not anti-Semitic, and was supported by a surprisingly large number of Jews.

But under Nazi Germany's influence, the party turned xenophobic, anti-Zionist and anti-Semitic. Race laws were unveiled in 1938, and increasingly harsh amendments were subsequently added. Italian Jews were reduced to pariahs, but were not deported until Germany occupied the country in 1943. Altogether, upwards of 8,000 Italian Jews perished during the Holocaust.

With the passing of the Mussolini era, fascism was banned and rendered illegal in Italy. But that didn't stop a band of nostalgic fascists from forming a successor party, the Italian Social Movement, or, as it was known in Italian, the Movimento Sociale Italiano (MSI).

The MSI reinvented itself as a conservative party, backed by elements of the petit and middle bourgeoisie, southern landowners, small shopkeepers and some students. Then, as now, it placed special emphasis on a strong central government, law and order and curbs on immigration.

Throughout its existence, the MSI has been a marginal party. In the 1946 general election, the MSI won 2 percent of the vote, picking up six seats in parliament. It fared better in the 1950s, winning the allegiance of 1.5 million voters and capturing 29 parliamentary seats. In the 1963 election, the MSI, with 1.5 million votes, sent 27 representatives to parliament. In 1968, it lost three of its seats. Four years later, the MSI won 55 seats, but lost ground in the 1976 and 1979 elections. The party won 42 seats in 1983, 35 in 1987 and 34 in 1992.

This year, in an effort to enlarge its appeal, the MSI changed its name to the National Alliance, and ran a slate of young, media-wise candidates. One of the most prominent was Mussolini's granddaughter, Alessandra, a 31-year-old movie actress who won a parliamentary seat in Naples. (Curiously enough, in one of her latest films, shot in Israel, she was cast as an Israeli soldier.)

The National Alliance's recent success at the polls comes against the backdrop of a spate of racist incidents which have raised fears of growing intolerance in Italy.

In the main, the violence has been directed against visible minorities, notably new immigrants and refugees from the Third World. But Italy's 35,000 Jews have not been immune.

Since 1992, a number of Jewish shops, schools, cemeteries, community buildings and synagogues throughout the country have been vandalized. And some football games have been punctuated by anti-Semitic chants from spectators.

Meanwhile, in spite of the Vatican's condemnation of anti-Semitism, a survey taken two years ago found that anti-Jewish attitudes permeate sectors of Italian society.

According to the poll, published in the magazine L'Espresso, 10 percent of the respondents believed Jews should leave Italy, while 56 percent thought that Jews have a "special relationship with money."

Observers believe that some of the vandalism perpetrated against the Jewish community can be attributed to skinheads, who appear to have an affinity with the National Alliance. The skinheads, who are numerically insignificant, are violently opposed to immigrants and are anti-Zionist and anti-Semitic, according to a report published by the World Jewish Congress.

The upsurge of racial intolerance in Italy, which is echoed elsewhere in Europe, has met with resistance.

In September 1992, the president of Italy, Oscar Luigi Scalfaro, paid a visit to Rome's chief rabbi, Elio Toaff, to demonstrate his solidarity with the Jewish community after a series of anti-Semitic incidents.

Two months later, 50,000 Italians, many shouting "Nazis out of the sewers and into the jails" and calling for the disbanding of what is now the National Alliance, marched through Rome in two separate rallies against anti-Semitism.

It might appear to some that anti-Semitism in Italy is growing. But looked at in perspective, anti-Semitism, Italian style, remains a rather low-grade phenomenon, rejected by the majority of Italians.

The emergence of the National Alliance, to be sure, is a worrisome development. But it should be borne in mind that, whatever its shortcomings and historic antecedents, the National Alliance under its present leadership has definitely jettisoned its anti-Semitic legacy.

Sweden shaken by anti-Jewish scandal

By RABBI ROBERT WOLKOFF

An anti-Semitic scandal of unparalleled intensity has broken out in Sweden. A professor of religion at Uppsala University, Jan Bergman, has been exposed as an academically incompetent anti-Semite. The theological faculty and the administration of Uppsala, which came to his defence, were also criticized in the strongest terms.

The intensity of the reaction in Sweden, which exceeds the reaction to the Farrakhan controversy in the United States, is a reflection of both the importance of the figures involved and the history of the conflict, which has been festering for five years.

The issue does not involve gutter demagogues who could be dismissed as representing insignificant, radical fringe groups. Uppsala University, whose prestige has been severely shaken by the affair, has historically been one of the greatest European institutions of higher learning. Bergman is responsible for teaching Judaica to approximately half of those studying to be priests in the Swedish church (of which 85 per cent of Swedes are members), as well as to a large proportion of teachers of religion (a required subject in Swedish schools) and academic researchers.

National media covered the controversy

It is therefore not surprising that the devastating new report by professor Inge Lonning of Oslo University had the impact of a bombshell. The topic has been covered in lengthy segments on Swedish national television and radio, and the op/ed pages of the major newspapers have been covered with articles signed by the most prominent cultural figures in Sweden. The debate involves a long overdue coming to terms with Swedish anti-Semitism, which is characterized by collusion between left-wing academic anti-Zionists, Arab propagandists, Christian theological anti-Semites, and neo-Nazi hate groups.

In the late 1980s, a local radio station in Stockholm, Radio Islam, began broadcasting the most blatantly anti-Semitic programming in all of Europe. The director of the station, Ahmed Rami, was a refugee from Morocco, where he had reportedly been involved in subversive activities. Economic support for Rami, as well as ghost-writing, were provided by Swedish neo-Nazis. In his radio programs he maintained that there was a Zionist conspiracy dominating the Western news media to further the Zionist goal of world domination. He denied the Holocaust as a Zionist "propaganda bluff" (and would later repeatedly invite the French revisionist Faurisson to Sweden as a "guest speaker"). The Jews were sexually obsessed, degenerate, and cruel, he maintained. According to their Bible, it was a mitzvah — a divine commandment — to kill non-Jews.

In 1989, Rami was indicted for "racial incitement," which is forbidden by Swedish law. Immediately Swedish anti-Zionists (among them the internationally known writer Jan Myrdal; the dominant force in the Swedish Green party, Per Gahrton; and the editor of the Swedish Church newspaper, Ingvar Laxvik) came to Rami's defence, arguing that "the Zionist mafia" was attempting to squelch legitimate criticism of "Zionist aggression."

The case came to trial. Enter Jan Bergman as an expert witness for the defence. To a stunned audience (often consisting of Holocaust survivors sitting beside neo-Nazis), Bergman proclaimed that Jews do indeed consider it a mitzvah to kill non-Jews, a mitzvah which to a "large extent" is being applied in Israel today. He went on to say that he could imagine that there were interpretations (none of which he had seen) according to which it would be an even greater mitzvah to kill a non-Jewish child.

During the trial, Bergman consistently refused to condemn any of Rami's statements about Jews as evidence of "contempt" for the Jewish people (a Swedish legal aspect of "ethnic excitement"), or anti-Semitism. In addition, his testimony revealed a striking ignorance of basic Judaica.

Rami was convicted on 17 counts, more than anyone else in Swedish history, and was sentenced to a prison term. Radio Islam was closed down (it reopened briefly, then closed again after a second trial). But the controversy had now shifted from Rami and Radio Islam to Bergman and Uppsala University.

Bergman's testimony triggered a flurry of protest letters (including several by this writer) calling for him to be removed from his responsibilities for teaching Judaica. The university chose to stonewall, using a characteristically Swedish approach of "burying the topic in paragraphs," that is, using the fine print of administrative regulations to divert attention from the obviously outrageous moral and academic issue.

Devastating report brands Bergman an incompetant

Bergman's colleagues were called upon to defend him, which they did unanimously. Administrators who openly admitted they were incompetent in matters of Judaica declared, nevertheless, that Bergman was in no way an anti-Semite, and "had not committed any error in his teaching," Since the university maintained that it had followed "correct procedures" in the matter, those who continued to attack Bergman were criticized for attempting to "undermine academic freedom."

A "war of reports" then began, involving ever-widening circles of Judaica scholars, including Professor R. J. Z. Werblowsky of Hebrew University, whose criticism of Bergman's competence was scathing. Uppsala responded by arguing that Bergman had been misunderstood, misquoted, subject to character assassination, etc.

The person responsible for choosing this line of defence, prefect Sigbert Axelson, has long been one of the most important anti-Zionist theologians in Sweden, as well as a personal friend of Bergman. Last year, a remarkable memo by Axelson was leaked to the press. In it, he described the Israel-led "Zionist conspiracy" within Sweden. Its purpose, he maintained, was to destroy the Swedish church and other major Swedish institutions. The attacks on professor Bergman were, he wrote, only the opening shot in that campaign.

The fact that Axelson was subject to such conspiratorial fantasies further undermined the position of the university. It was, after all, Axelson who was called on by the university to write an "objective" account of the whole affair.

This scandal led to the latest and most serious one. Battered by the criticism, Stig Strömholm, the rector of Uppsala, turned to the former rector of Oslo Univesrsity, Inge Lonning, for a truly objective, definitive, outside examination of Bergman's testimony, as well as the actions of the university and the opinions of the critics.

To everyone's surprise, Lonning's newly released report was devastating. Bergman was indeed, according to the report, incompetent and anti-Semitic. He had not been misquoted at all. On the contrary, his statements were "even worse when seen in context." Axelson's "sloppiness with words was exceeded only by his sloppiness with the truth." The various reports which issued from the university "did nothing to clarify the matter." And the critics were declared to have been right on every point.

Strömholm's initial reaction was to agree fully with the Lonning report. But this means less than first meets the eye. Strömholm has been subject to renewed criticism for again attempting to "bury the topic in paragraphs," accepting the report without taking any steps to correct the situation. He has in turn gone on the offensive, accusing the university's critics of attempting to "undermine the rule of law."

The position of the university continues to be that, in spite of the Lonning report, Jan Bergman will be allowed to teach Judaica until he retires — which won't occur until the turn of the century. Unless something remarkable happens, new generations of students at Uppsala University will, therefore, continue to learn that Jews consider it a mitzvah to kill non-Jews.

(The author served for a decade as rabbi of the Jewish community of Gothenburg, Sweden. He writes and lectures internationally on anti-Semitism and other topics.)

Israel's fickle labor force

The recent wave of terrorism in Israel, the most serious since the late 1960s, could be an opportunity for the Israeli government to finally wean itself off Palestinian labor from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

In the wake of the Afula car-bombing incident, perpetrated by Hamas, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin sealed off the territories, preventing Palestinian workers from entering sovereign Israel. He took this drastic step to stem the flow of potential terrorists into Israel and to assure jittery Israelis that their safety is of primary importance. Yet, as it turned out, the closure was merely temporary. Last week, Israel eased its ban.

It is, however, in Israel's long range national interest to end its dependence on Palestinian workers beyond the Green Line. It is a fickle labor force, subject to the vagaries of the political and security situation, and thus potentially harmful to the country. Furthermore, the reliance on cheap Palestinian laborers, principally in construction, agriculture and the service industries, slows down Israel's drive to modernize and restructure its economy for the challenges of the next century. Finally, the existence of a Palestinian underclass, which best describes this labor force, demeans and corrupts Israeli society and contradicts the tenets of classical Zionism.

Of course, Israel cannot achieve this goal in one fell swoop. As the occupying power in the territories, Israel is responsible for the well-being of its Arab residents. But in pursuit of this ultimate objective, Israel should pump job-creating funds into the West Bank and Gaza. Last week, in fact, Israel announced it would spend about $14 million for this very purpose. More funds are obviously needed, and perhaps countries like Canada, the United States, Britain, Germany and Japan can contribute.

Eventually, the Palestinians themselves, aided by their friends in the Arab world and elsewhere, will have to build a self-sustaining economy within the parameters of autonomy and self-determination. In the meantime, Israel should do what it can to lessen its dependence on Palestinian workers.

The Waldheim ignominy

In what must be one of the great ironies of history, the spacecraft Voyager, still hurtling through interstellar regions more than two decades after its launching, carries the voice of Kurt Waldheim as Secretary General of the United Nations conveying a message of peace to the citizens of outer space.

The American Justice Department has recently released a 204-page report about Waldheim which might prompt many to suggest that the satellite bearing his cheery message should be immediately recalled. Alas, that is not possible.

The report indicates that "Waldheim assisted or otherwise participated in persecution because of race, religion, national origin or political opinion." It was on the basis of these charges that Waldheim was refused entry to the United States in 1987.

The American Justice Department's Office of Special Investigation concludes in this report that Austria's former president played a part in the transfer of prisoners to the SS for use as slave labor, mass deportations to concentration and death camps, use of anti-Semitic propaganda, mistreatment and execution of Allied prisoners and execution of hostages and other civilians in reprisal acts.

The report says that during his service in the Balkans, Waldheim co-operated with the intelligence arm of the SS. It also indicates that Waldheim failed to rebut the case against him or otherwise demonstrate that he did not engage in activities he has been acccused of participating in.

The Justice Department in Washington adds that on the basis of the strong evidence against Waldheim, it would have been necessary to begin deportation hearings against him if he had been in the United States.

In the post World War II period, Kurt Waldheim the diplomat has always represented himself as an advocate of human rights. In his other incarnation as a junior intelligence officer in the Balkans, Waldheim, under the pretext of military necessity, co-operated in the destruction of human rights and human beings.

It would be salutary for all concerned if Waldheim finally came clean on his wartime activities. Repentance is good for the soul.

ARAB ATROCITIES

The leader of the PLO, Yasser Arafat, continues his shenanigans in dealing with the media. After seven teenagers, aged 14 to 16, were killed, and about 50 were injured by a suicide bomber in Afulah, Arafat expressed to the media in his typically deceitful manner, that it was the Israeli government's fault because they have not accelerated the peace process and have been dragging their feet as well.

When Baruch Goldstein killed 30 Palestinians in the Hebron massacre, the whole world, including the Jewish world, condemned him. However, when the tables are turned, no Arab leader apologizes for or condemns these acts.

What is it going to take to get the world to realize that the Israelis are bending over backwards and have almost fallen over themselves to make peace? Meanwhile, the world at large continues to gloss over all the blatant acts of Arab terrorism. One would think that over the last 25 years, incidents from the 1972 Olympics murders to the recent bannings of screening the film Schindler's List would show the world the Arab mentality.

It seems that the world continues to wear blinders when it comes to atrocities committed by Arabs.

OTHERS SAVED JEWS

In the April 7 issue of The CJN there was a very informative article from Sheldon Kirshner, titled The Holocaust of Hungary. The article gave well deserved credit to the Swedish rescue efforts. I would like to add some more information on the activities of the neutral countries.

Besides Sweden, other countries were making efforts to save Jewish people. These efforts are reported by Randolph L. Braham in The Politics of Genocide; and Asher Cohen in The Halutz Resistence in Hungary. On the status, as of Nov. 12, 1944, Cohen's book provides the following data on page 185: "The number of protective passes authorized by the authorities at this time was as follows: Switzerland, 7,800; Sweden, 4,500; the Vatican, 2,500; Portugal, 700; Spain, 100."

Braham, on page 1075 of his book, wrote: "Although the Nunciature was authorized to issue only 2,500 such certificates, it actually issued many more." The books quotes 15,000. Similar "irregularities" are recorded with the Swiss Consulate, which issued a further 7,800 passes. Following that, working out of one of the consulate's buildings ("Uveghaz"), thousands more were issued by the Halutz resistance. The Swiss Consulate never protested. On the contrary, they extended help to everybody possessing any of the certificates. I am a witness to it.

With the help of "unauthorized" certificates, my mother came back three times, and my sister four times from the Brickyard and from an already assembled transport.

The Swiss Consulate under the leadership of consul Charles Lutz made extensive efforts, with the passes and other methods, to save Jewish life. These and other activities, are recorded in the books mentioned above.

While Raoul Wallenberg's work and heroism cannot be belittled, the efforts of others must also be acknowledged. Indeed one may wonder what would have been the direction of the rescue missions without Wallenberg.

WE'RE BLUSHING

It has been over 44 years since I left Canada and last read a Canadian Jewish newspaper — I then read the English page in the Toronto Hebrew Journal which I bought daily — and now I have two copies of your weekly newspaper! My reactions were so strong that I feel obligated to relate them to you.

Please accept my congratulations on achieving what is so apparently your intention — that it be a "family" newspaper, and the family to which I refer is that of the entire Canadian Jewish community. By your complete open-mindedness, you have succeeded in bringing together, within these several pages, all aspects and opinions that are to be found within the community: religious and non-religious; pro-Zionist and those who are indifferent to Zionism; the socially active and those who have isolated themselves from the community; the various and numerous expressions of what is generally termed as being "cultural"; and the inclusion of whatever news from wherever it may come that touches upon our lives and feelings as Jews. I sincerely believe that your newspaper plays a great role in binding the Jewish community together.

(Your modesty must not prevent you from printing the above!)

Here in Israel we dedicate the day preceding our Day of Independence as a Day of Remembrance (Yom Zikaron), for those who gave their lives before and after the recreation of our existence as an independent entity — this year 2nd of Iyar (April 13).

Two of those who will be remembered came from Toronto. They were members of Hashomer Hatzair, the Chalutz youth movement. Lilik Krongold died defending the Canadian-American kibbutz, Ein Hashofet, in 1937. Sydney "Shaya" Rubinoff, who was a close personal friend of mine, died while attacking the police-fortress of Latrun, held by the Jordanian Arab Legion — against mortars and machine-guns, with only rifles in their hands, in the unsuccessful attempt to relieve the besieged city of Jerusalem, in 1948.

A GOOD EDITORIAL, BUT . . .

Re: Editorial, Precious Causes (CJN, April 14).

Congratulations on finally having a Canadian content editorial.

However, your writer, who obviously used the press release on the National Jewish education conference while praising Winnipeg and mentioning the federations' concerns, neglected to mention that the sponsors for this seventh national conference are the Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canadian Zionist Federation.

I guess in the enthusiasm of finally being Canadian this obvious omission is understandable.

About people who say: 'Let's be fair to the Nazis'

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

I read that Universal Studios will not screen Schindler's List in a number of Muslim countries, such as Syria, Iraq and Pakistan. Therefore, I was not overly surprised when I heard on the radio that Malaysia (which is largely Muslim) had banned the showing of the film. Since then, the government has changed course, but it is not clear how and in what form the movie might be shown after all.

What intrigued me was the reason which the Malaysian government originally gave that: "the film was pure Jewish propaganda, and very one-sided."

Obviously, this was a political move which had nothing to do with film-making and everything with how that particular nation sees the Jews and understands history.

Understandably Malaysia feels a strong affinity with other Muslim countries, many of which have largely Arab populations. Now these countries have been the traditional enemies of Israel, and consequently anything that shows the Jewish state (and by extension, Jews in general) in a favorable light is by definition objectionable to them. Their people must not be exposed to a view which runs counter to what they have been fed all these decades, and not only is Israel an enemy of humanity but so are the Jews as a people. The Elders of Zion are found in book stores of most of these lands and are avidly consumed; the Jew who in medieval Europe was the devil incarnate has moved to Arab/Muslim countries. If Arabs were not themselves Semites it would be fair to say that anti-Semitism is well and alive in that populous part of the world. Therefore anything that shows Jews in a way that would lead the viewer to sympathize with them is politically incorrect.

Rabbi Plaut

But more, Jews in Schindler's List are portrayed as victims of unrelenting, unlimited cruelty. Now, the image of the Jews (and especially Israelis) as victims, runs counter to a perception that these nations want to foster, that Jews (Israel) are victimizers rather than victims. Thinking along these lines has been around for quite some time and is not surprising. In fact, one might have expected it.

What was unexpected however was the added reason the radio announcer transmitted to us about the thinking of the Malaysian government at the time. It was the statement that the film was deemed "too one-sided."

The Malaysian government evidently thought that showing Jews as victims and Nazis as victimizers represented an unfair balance. After all, the picture did not reveal how "brave" the executioners were who gassed the Jews. It did not show how the Nazi guards loved their dogs or explain how careful camp commander Goeth was in his trarget practice when he shot only one Jew at a time. Something along these lines.

Or perhaps we should have been instructed about the ecological concerns of the Nazis who wanted to make sure that the Zyklon-B gas would kill only Jews and not, by mistake, such innocents as frogs or insects. Also, was it fair to show only how successful Oskar Schindler was in deceiving his superiors? Should we not have also seen, how thorough and mechanically perfect they were in dispatching six million? All told therefore, so the obvious reasoning of the original censor was, the film is one-sided. The good side of the Nazi killers was never exposed. I like to think that in the end the Malaysian government itself found this reasoning of dubious worth.

Meanwhile, the Holocaust is being denied altogether in many parts of the world. Since Schindler's List indubitably strikes a blow at this lie it is considered to be against the interest of many states. When push comes to shove, truth often lose out to politics — at least in the short haul. But history has its own way of progressing slowly and inexorably, and in the long run people will want to see what their government has banned or has declared unwelcome. It usually works that way.

American foreign aid proposal worries some

By DEBORAH KALB
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The pro-Israel community is keeping a close eye on the Clinton administration's ambitious plan to revamp foreign aid, as the proposal begins to make its way through Congress.

Designed to bring foreign aid out of what the administration considers an obsolete Cold War aid structure, the plan would allow a continuation of Israel's $3 billion annual installment of U.S. foreign aid, at least for now.

But despite this reassurance, some backers of Israel — while supportive of the overall concept of foreign aid reform — are concerned about elements of the reform plan.

For example, the revamped aid plan would switch from the decades-old system of providing aid to specific countries to a new format whereby aid is designated based on broad international objectives.

The administration has called for $21 billion in fiscal year 1995 on spending on international affairs, of which $14 billion would go to foreign aid.

The objectives include building democracy, promoting sustainable development and promoting peace.

Aid for Israel and Egypt, the Camp David countries, is found under the "promoting peace" category, and accounts for the majority of aid that would be disbursed in that category under the administration's plan.

The "promoting peace" category totals $6.4 billion, of which $5.5 billion would go to regional peace and security.

Egypt receives $2.1 billion annually.

"The priority we attach to peace in the Middle East is reflected by the fact that our request this year is $5.2 billion, $5.1 billion of which would go for Israel and Egypt, the same level as last year," Secretary of State Warren Christopher recently told the Senate appropriations subcommittee on foreign operations.

The sense among some pro-Israel activists is that Israel will emerge with its aid intact.

Congress will only be interested in tinkering with parts of the foreign aid system that do not work, and aid to Israel does not fall into that category, these activists argue.

But some in the pro-Israel community continue to worry that if aid to Israel is formally justified solely on the basis of the Middle East peace process, the aid will not necessarily be guaranteed in the long run.

"What if Israel is at peace with some neighbors but not Iran and Iraq, or if the peace process breaks down completely?" one Hill staffer asked. "The language (in the administration proposal) is so narrow."

Others worry that the formulation in the new plan discounts Israel's value to the United States as a democratic ally in the Middle East.

At a recent hearing of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Rep. Eric Fingerhut (D-Ohio) touched on these concerns.

Fingerhut asked Christopher whether placing all the aid to Israel and Egypt under the "promoting peace" category might result in "conveying a different message than we wish to convey about the strategic importance of the democracy and the open election processes in the Middle East."

Christopher said that "the first step here has to be to end the conflict which has just monopolized the attention of most of the countries in that area."

He added, however, that "in the longer term we obviously will be promoting democracy there as well."

While most of the pro-Israel community has been supportive of the Clinton administration's approach to Israel and do not think he would act to harm the Jewish state, they worry about how this aid system — which would place more decisions in the hands of the executive branch — would be used in the hands of a less-sympathetic administration.

"We basically trust the Clinton administration to be pro-Israel, but the law could be in effect for 30 years like the last one," said one Capitol Hill staffer. "We are going to want language that is more protective of Israel."

The current foreign aid system was enacted in 1961.

Another concern involves the administration's desire to eliminate "earmarks" — the congressional designations of how specific money is to be spent.

Some pro-Israel activists say this battle is not new. They note that past administrations and Congresses have fought over earmarks and over who has the final say on how U.S. dollars are spent.

They also point out that the fight over earmarks extends beyond aid to Israel and even beyond foreign aid.

But other pro-Israel sources say they are worried about this latest battle to get rid of earmarks, because with fewer earmarks, and in the context of foreign aid reform, pro-Israel members of Congress would have less say over the specifics of Israel's aid package.

The administration, for its part, seems to have concluded that earmarks for aid to Israel and Egypt are inevitable, at least for the time being.

In response to a question from Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) at recent Senate hearings, Christopher acknowledged that "ultimately we did support an earmark for Egypt and Israel. We began the year hoping those could be avoided and that assurances could be given by consultation, but we did ultimately support an earmark for Egypt and Israel."

Christopher added, "We'd like to start out with a no-earmark bill, but I'm realistic enough to know that we'll probably end up where we did last year."

"The Israel earmark is around for a few more years," predicted one Hill aide, at least in part because it is "one of the only main consensus issues left for the Jewish community."

For the still-strong Jewish lobby, the aide said, "the $3 billion earmark is still the rallying cry."

At a recent House hearing, Christopher reiterated the administration's support for Israel and for keeping Israel's aid levels constant in the future, especially as Israel continues with the peace process.

"Israel's security is extremely important to us. It has the highest priority and I think particularly as Israel takes risks for peace, the United States needs to respond in a way to give reassurance by our aid levels," the secretary said.

Jewish leaders have been assured repeatedly by the administration that Israel's aid will remain intact for now.

But some pro-Israel sources on Capitol Hill have expressed concern about what will happen to other longtime practices, such as congressional designations of exactly how and when and under what circumstances aid to Israel is disbursed, in a future with fewer earmarks.

"We want to find out what to substitute for that if there are no earmarks," one Hill aide commented.

And some in the Jewish community are looking to the long term, concerned that competition for foreign aid will increase, and that Israel, the largest recipient of foreign aid, will be the focus of much of this attention.

The Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, for example, is studying the long-term implications of foreign aid reform.

Overall, some pro-Israel sources on the Hill believe that the administration's proposal will be changed as it goes through the relevant committees dealing with foreign aid.

The House Foreign Affairs Committee, for example, has a good proportion of pro-Israel members, they note.

Some are watching closely to see if both houses of Congress actually decide to move on the reform plan this year.

And some think foreign aid reform will not pass this year.

"I'm doubtful it's going to happen," said one Hill staffer. "It's an election year, and foreign aid votes are really unpopular, especially in an election year."

The plan is "an exercise in theory," the staffer said. "If the Jewish community doesn't support it, it's not going to pass."

Honeymoon in Jerusalem had a lasting impact

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

We spent our honeymoon in Jerusalem, and found it to be a place of permanence rooted in the scrub-covered hills surrounding the city, in the twisting alley-ways, in the milky beige of the building stones, in the tree-lined residential streets, in the golden light.

Yet, the result of spending time in this city of solidity is the counterpoint to permanence: change, because the place has such tremendous personal impact. Jerusalem made changes in me and in my family, changes that have become almost second nature in the fifteen years since that honeymoon. But the upcoming May 9 celebration of Jerusalem Day, Yom Yerushalayim, provokes me to relive our weeks there.

Conflict and politics have changed Jerusalem since we visited. I don't think I'd shop alone in the shouk today, or walk some of the neighborhoods I strolled in 1979, or when we revisited the city in 1981. But even the passage of so much time has not dimmed the friendships we made or lessened the clarity of our memories.

Erica Meyer Rauzin

We lived for two weeks of our eight-week trip (I can no longer imagine being able to put such a long vacation together; even then with no kids and few responsibilities, it took a year of planning) in a room in a boarding house near the prime minister's residence. The house was in a shade-dappled neighborhood of embassies and grand old homes now carved into apartments or rent-a-rooms like ours. We had hot water two hours a day (and then you had to be first in the shower), we hung our laundry on a clothesline that stretched across the room, and we laughed at the idea of cucumbers and tomatoes for breakfast, even as we demolished every bite the landlady set out on her oil-cloth covered table.

Then we moved into the apartment we had rented, sight unseen, for the rest of our stay. Through correspondence, we leased the one-bedroom flat of a professor who was spending the summer in the United States.

The professor's daughter met us at the door of the apartment on a Thursday afternoon. She gave us the key and took us on a two-minute tour. "Well," she said, "here's the living room, here's the bedroom and the bath, and here's the kitchen. The right side is fleishig; the left side is milchig." And then she left.

One glitch: as of that instant, I had never spent more than five minutes in a kosher kitchen. I had never cooked a kosher meal in my life. I knew nothing about keeping kosher, nothing at all.

I was terrified that I would ruin the man's kitchen. I was scared to touch anything. We ate nothing but eggs and potatoes for three days. I got very brave on Sunday and added eggplant, tomatoes and onions, but that was it until Monday when I started Judaic study classes and prevailed upon a senior classmate to come home with me and tell me what to do.

I changed in Jerusalem: I have kept a kosher kitchen ever since.

The apartment was in a relatively new building, part of a complex circling a hidden courtyard in the Old City. The narrow path around the square garden connected to the Old City's web of paths. We often felt, as we sat on our front step and watched the passing parade, that if we stayed there long enough, every type of person in the world would go by. We saw chic women in designer fashions, black-coated yeshivah students debating as they passed by, small Arab boys leading laden donkeys.

We could walk from the apartment to Jaffa Gate, to the vegetable market, to the Western Wall. The courtyard path led to the rest of the world and to the rest of our marriage. Like so much else, our marriage started in Israel, in Jerusalem, awash in gold light, capable of change, rooted in the promise of permanence.

Mandela praises Jewish community

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Barring an astonishing reversal, Nelson Mandela is likely to become South Africa's next president after its first multiracial general election this week.

It is a pivotal moment in Africa's often turbulent history. After decades of apartheid, in which non-whites were repressed and disenfranchised, a black man will probably assume the presidency.

A prisoner of conscience for many years and currently the president of the African National Congress, Mandela has both comforted and alienated South Africa's influential Jewish community, the largest in Africa.

Within months of being released from prison in February 1990, Mandela told American Jewish leaders in a meeting in Geneva that he sympathized with "the struggles of the Jewish people and their persecution," that he had been "very much influenced by the lack of racialism" among Jews, and that he had resisted pressure from Libya, an ally, to eliminate Jewish participation in the ANC.

Today, four Jews are among the top 50 names on the ANC's slate of electoral candidates — Joe Slovo, Ronnie Kasrils, Raymond Suttner and Gill Marcus.

Mandela has been quoted as saying that he has been inspired by three former Israeli prime ministers — David Ben-Gurion, Golda Meir and Menachem Begin. Ben-Gurion, because of his vision of statehood; Meir, because of her opposition to apartheid while serving as Israel's foreign minister; and Begin, because of his ideas on armed revolt as a means of achieving national independence.

In the past two years, Mandela, who has surrounded himself with Jewish advisors, has singled out Jews for praise and sought to assure South African Jews that they have nothing to fear in the new South Africa.

In an apparently unsolicited Passover message in 1992, Mandela referred to South African Jewry's "particularly outstanding contribution" to his people's "struggle for freedom and social justice."

He added that Jews had made contributions "second to none" to South Africa's development.

Less than a year later, Mandela spoke of the "common interests" of blacks and Jews and of their history of cooperation against apartheid.

Most recently, he said that Jews in disproportionate numbers had been involved in the battle for democracy, and that an ANC government would respect Jewish communal institutions and never indulge in anti-Semitism.

Mandela's remarks with regard to Israel and Zionism have not been as reassuring.

Nelson Mandela

In a speech delivered in Lusaka, Zambia, in 1990, Mandela compared the ANC's struggle with that of the Palestinians, and wished PLO chairman Yasser Arafat success in combating "a unique form of colonialism.".

These statements were not surprising, given the ANC's brotherly ties with the PLO and Israel's close relationship with the white minority South African government.

But shortly afterward, in his meeting with American Jews in Switzerland, Mandela claimed that his comments had been misunderstood. "The ANC accepts unequivocably the existence of... Israel," he was quoted as saying. "We have never hesitated in that. We accept it not only de facto, but also its legal right to exist. We accept that ...Israel, like any other state, must exist within secure borders."

During his first visit to the United States in 1990, Mandela was asked to state his view of the United Nations' 1975 General Assembly resolution equating Zionism with racism.

He replied: "It depends what is meant by Zionism. If Zionism means the right of Israel to occupy lands of other countries like the Golan Heights, West Bank, the Gaza Strip, then I condemn that. But if Zionism means the desire of the Jewish community to have their own state, then I support it."

In the same year, Mandela described Arafat as a "comrade in arms," and declared that he identified with the PLO because, "just like ourselves, they are fighting for the right of self-determination."

Although Jewish groups were critical of these observations, the Israeli UN representative played down Israel's differences with Mandela and focused on his remarks supporting Israel's right to exist.

On his second trip to the United States in 1991, shortly after the Madrid peace process got under way, Mandela characterized as obsolete the UN resolution linking Zionism with racism. (The resolution was eventually repealed.) Expressing support for direct Arab-Israeli talks, Mandela reiterated his view of Zionism, spoke warmly of the involvement of Jews in the ANC, and thanked the Jewish lawyers who had represented him and other black leaders in bygone South African trials.

Since Mandela's transformation into South Africa's most important black politician, Israel has courted him and the ANC assiduously.

Israel's foreign minister, Shimon Peres, has met with Mandela at the UN. And Israel's ambassador in Pretoria, Alon Liel, has invited Mandela and other black leaders to Israel. Mandela has accepted the invitation in principle, but no date has been set. In January 1993, the first ANC delegation, drawn from its Youth League, arrived in Israel. Last October, the leaders of eight South African political organizations, including the ANC, were in Israel.

Last year, Liel urged the Zionist Federation to enter into dialogue with the ANC. "Do it now," he advised. "Do it before they are too busy to receive you."

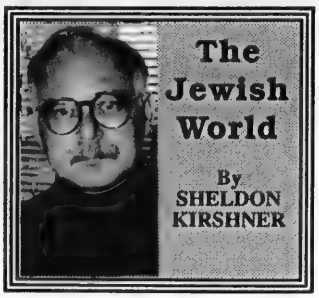
While building bridges to the ANC and the non-white community, Israel has been careful to preserve its good relations with the current South African government, headed by President F.W. de Klerk.

In November 1991, de Klerk paid an official visit to Israel, the first by a South African leader since 1975. Israel paved the way for de Klerk's trip by lifting economic and cultural sanctions it had imposed on South Africa in March 1987 under pressure from the United States.

De Klerk promised that the "new South Africa" would remain a "trustworthy friend," and Israel and South Africa signed a memorandum of understanding for closer economic ties.

Israel's military relationship with South Africa is reportedly intact. Israel has supplied South Africa with missile boats, reconnaissance aircraft and technical information on ballistic missiles and the manufacture of fighter jets.

Israel is said to have cooperated with South Africa in the field of nuclear weapons, but such reports have not been substantiated.



Our parents and grandparents personally remember that era, that depressing time when European Jews were taken to the slaughter and the world more or less looked on indifferently.

We know now that untold numbers of Jews could have been saved during the Holocaust if Western countries, including Canada and the United States, had made greater efforts to provide them with a sanctuary.

Anyone who's read Irving Abella's and Harold Troper's classic, None Is Too Many, realizes that Canada displayed a mean-spirited attitude toward Jewish refugees in their hour of duress.

And those who've perused the books of Arthur Morse and David Wyman know all too well that the United States was not much better in this respect.

This point, which is no longer in any real dispute, was magnified recently by a chilling PBS documentary, America and the Holocaust: Deceit and Indifference.

The gist of it is that the liberal Roosevelt administration, supposedly a friend of American Jews, did not do enough for endangered Jewish refugees desperate to flee Nazi persecution.

Indeed, the State Department played down the known facts about the Holocaust as a matter of policy and prejudice.

Of course, these are not shocking revelations which have suddenly come to light. The value of America and the Holocaust is that it documents the facts in clear, unambiguous language, faithfully mirroring the times.

Context is important. U.S. policy did not emerge in a vacuum. It was basically a function of a widespread anti-Semitic climate which pervaded American society before World War II, a fact of life to which older generations can attest.

U.S. & the Holocaust

To be sure, America was not like Nazi Germany or fascist Italy and Hungary. Official anti-Semitism, promoted and encouraged by the government, simply did not exist. In this sense, American Jews were blessed. On an informal level, however, anti-Semitism bit deeply into the American Jewish psyche.

Jews were subjected to blatant prejudice in the labor market; newspaper job ads blandly indicated a preference for Christians. Resorts and hotels did not welcome Jewish guests. Universities were reluctant to hire Jews. Nativist congressmen spewed anti-Semitic filth, and the Rev. Charles Coughlin's anti-Jewish diatribes on radio reached more than three million listeners. Furthermore, public opinion polls revealed that innumerable gentiles considered American Jews a "menace" who should be "restricted."

American immigration laws reflected this ethnocentrism. In 1939, the United States turned away the St. Louis, a German ship carrying Jewish refugees. President Roosevelt let die a bill which would have admitted 20,000 Jewish children, while Congress passed legislation allowing British children to enter the country.

In essence, Jewish refugees were perceived as a "threat," and no U.S. government agency personified this philosophy more than the conservative State Department and Assistant Secretary of State Breckenbridge Long.

A Roosevelt appointee, Long endorsed this anti-alien bigotry. To be fair, he also feared that German spies would be infiltrated into America disguised as refugees. Long thus instructed U.S. embassies and consulates "to put every obstacle in the way" of refugees applying for visas. As a result, numerous refugees perished, including the parents of Kurt Klein, a German Jew whose heart-rending story is skillfully woven into the fabric of America and the Holocaust.

Bowing to pressure exerted by Robert Morgenthau, the secretary of the treasury, the United States established the War Refugee Board in 1944 to assist imperilled Jews in Nazi-occupied Europe. It rescued approximately 200,000 Jews, yet its recommendation that Auschwitz be bombed was flatly rejected by the U.S. War Department, despite Allied bombing raids against nearby oil refineries which accidentally killed 85 Auschwitz inmates.

One is numbed and saddened by the callousness which dominated U.S. refugee policy. It's a shameful period we mustn't forget.

Belly dancers not kosher

By CARL ALPERT

The dictionary defines a belly dance as an Oriental solo dance performed by a woman with midriff exposed, emphasizing movements of the pelvis and abdominal muscles. To some Israelis it is a rather vulgar dance with sexual insinuations. To other Israelis, those who come from Middle Eastern countries and constitute more than half the population, it is an esthetic performance, part of the ethnic folk culture of the region, and frequently performed at joyous family celebrations like weddings or even bar mitzvahs. The dance costume is far from daring, and is much more tantalizing than revealing.

But to the judiciary, the legal community and the rabbinate, the belly dance may become the subject of a delicate controversy with far-reaching implications. Governments in Israel have risen and fallen on issues far less significant.

It is estimated that some 60 women earn their livelihood in Israel as exponents of the belly dance, and some have achieved national reputations for their sinuous skill in undulating the flesh. During the past year, however, the girls were alarmed to note a drastic dropping off in orders for their services. An inquiry quickly revealed the reason. Owners of the popular catering halls, where most weddings are held, informed the family celebrants that belly dancers must not appear on their premises because of threats from the rabbinate.

"We have been told in very clear terms that any caterer who permits a belly dancer to perform in his wedding hall will lose his kashrut certificate — and that would be equivalent to putting us out of business," more than one caterer told the girls.

American-born belly dancer Ilana Raskin was not one to acquisece quietly, and she sought the intervention of Israel's High Court of Justice. The judges took their time, but last May they handed down their ruling, saying that a kashrut certificate refers to the religious acceptability of the food served, and the fact that belly dancers may appear on the premises cannot be a consideration in the withholding or cancellation of such certificates.

Business withering away following ruling

The girls were jubilant, but business did not pick up. To the contrary, some contracts already signed were cancelled. Sephardi families, anxious to give their festivities a true Middle Eastern flavor, were equally indignant, but the caterers were adamant. Sure, the rabbis declare that they accept the court order that they desist from their policy; they will not put themselves in the position of showing contempt of court, but they make it very clear to the caterers that any hall where a belly dancer appears will find its kashruth observance given the most severe scrutiny.

A once flourishing business of belly dance entertainment in towns where there is a large North African population, like Ashdod, Kiryat Malachi, Safed, Tiberias and others, is simply withering away. The girls organized a guild, and a delegation of 10 of them (fully clothed) called on the religious council in Ashdod to protest a specific case. The rabbis stood firm, and the girls vowed that next time they would come in their dance costumes, and with an orchestra.

The religious functionaries maintain that the dances are provocative, that men in the audience are free and easy with their hands. The girls charge a relatively modest fee, compared to the tariff demanded by other top entertainers, but their income is augmented considerably by tips of "encouragement" in the form of paper money tucked under their shoulder straps or into their bodices during the performance.

The men are never permitted to become too intimate, and anyone who says otherwise has never seen a truly esthetic performance, the dancers say. Furthermore, Sephardi women and wives are among the most appreciative observers of their act.

The girls demand their rights. The rabbis stand firm, despite the court injunction. And the caterers, in the middle, refuse to endanger their own livelihood by antagonizing those who sign the kashrut papers.

The Israel Civic Rights Association is taking the matter very seriously, especially in view of the court ruling. Belly dancing may yet become a major cause celebre in Israel, but meanwhile, the poor caterers tremble as the rabbis strike at their most vulnerable point — the soft under belly of their business, as it were.

Eisen, Masters named UJA co-chairs

TORONTO — Long-time Jewish activist Wendy Eisen and veteran Toronto lawyer Bob Masters will be leading next year's United Jewish Appeal (UJA) campaign.

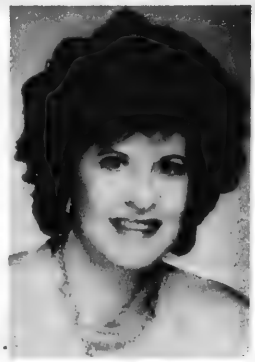
Eisen began her association with UJA 32 years ago in Montreal; Masters has also been involved with UJA throughout his life.

The primary goal for the incoming campaign chairs is to surpass last year's unprecedented total of $40 million. Another priority is to increase UJA's base of 30,000 donors and 2,000 volunteers to better meet community needs.

"Public funds for human services have been reduced," says Eisen. "Yet the number of people who need help has increased. So UJA requires more community involvement to strengthen its commitment and compassion for the needy."

Masters is proud of the way in which UJA has ensured the existence of essential services for Jews in Toronto and around the world.

"The funds we raised have sheltered the homeless and supplied the elderly with quality health care.



Wendy Eisen

Bob Masters

UJA proceeds permit thousands of children to receive a Jewish education. UJA contributions helped to free some of the war ravaged residents of Sarajevo and resettle them successfully in Israel."

Eisen and Masters plan to ask everyone participating in the 1995 campaign to bring in new people, with university students receiving a special pitch.

However, both leaders want to hear other ideas about expanding UJA's corps of contributors and volunteers.

Eisen remembers her first $15 campaign donation to Montreal's Combined Jewish Appeal in 1962, when she was a new bride. That was the year she chaired the Appeal's Young Marrieds division.

"I walked up two and three flights of stairs in small apartment buildings to retrieve contributions of one and two dollars."

By the time Eisen moved to Toronto in 1981, she had progressed well beyond her original $15, eventually chairing UJA's Atrarah division for major women's campaign contributors.

Masters recalls being challenged by former campaign co-chair Paul Morton "to give something back to the Jewish community." That's exactly what he's prepared to do — "devote all the time that's required to the task."

Above all, Eisen and Masters recognize that today's UJA must move in different directions to attract new contributors.

They succeed 1994 campaign chairs Lawrence Bloomberg and Lawrence Fein.

Baycrest fundraiser planned

TORONTO — The Women's Auxiliary of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care is holding it annual fundraising event, Night of Nights, May 3.

The black-tie party takes place in the Grand Ballroom of the Sheraton Centre, and features a silent auction, a casino and two dozen models wearing clothes selected by fashion mogul Milli Gould.

For 23 years, Gould has turned a one-room shop in Hamilton, Ont., into an international fashion oasis. Shops across North America carry her house label, while she imports top European lines at home.

Proceeds from this year's Night of Nights will be used for special care programs for elderly patients and residents at Baycrest Centre.

Ticket prices start at $350. For more information, please call the Women's Auxiliary at 789-7071.

Keneally's tale brought Schindler back to life

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The serendipity with which writer Thomas Keneally discovered the story of Oskar Schindler is fast approaching the stuff of urban legend.

En route to his native Australia from Italy one day in the early 1980s, Keneally stopped over in Los Angeles. Needing a new piece of baggage, he made his way to a posh Beverly Hills luggage shop, whose owner, Leopold Page, (ne Poldek Pfefferberg) was a Schindlerjude — one of the 1,100 Jews who cheated death by working in Schindler's enamelware and armaments factories.

Page had been hawking the remarkable story of the wartime profiteer and unlikely savior of Jews since the 1950s. At one point in the '60s, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer expressed serious interest in a film and even commissioned a screenplay. But nothing panned out.

Hearing that Keneally was an accomplished writer with some two dozen books to his name, Page dug into his own briefcase and pulled out Schindler's story.

Keneally, a macho-type writer whose ouevre included historically-based fictionalized accounts of war, adventure and mystery, was attracted to the project for two reasons: the ambiguousness of the main character and an innocent wonderment over why anyone would consider it essential to the future of Western civilization that Poldek Pfefferberg be murdered.

In 1982, Schindler Ark appeared in the U.K. and won that year's most prestigious British literary award, the Booker Prize for Fiction.

The following year, the American title, Schindler's List, won the 1983 Los Angeles Times Prize for Fiction.

Thomas Keneally

Quite a splash by an Aussie, who by his own admission "did not intend to ever write anything about the Holocaust because I thought, probably quite correctly, that it had nothing to do with me."

It's the kind of tale, touched by fate and luck, that Keneally loves to recount. No doubt he'll mention the origins of his most famous book this Sunday (May 1) at the Pantages Theatre, where he's scheduled to address an evening sponsored by the new leadership division of Jewish National Fund.

Not that the film version of Schindler's List needs any more hype. Steven Spielberg's epic scooped up seven Academy Awards, countless other accolades around the world and is being nearly revered as one of the most powerful Holocaust teaching tools ever.

Keneally doesn't mind that his book, now selling briskly, is riding on the coat-tails of the movie's popularity. (His other books, he chuckles, are selling too "by the pull of their big sister, Miss List.") While many authors scoff at and even disavow Hollywood treatments of their work, Keneally calls it "a very fine film, possibly a classic.

"My first impulse was to compare it with Lawrence of Arabia," he told The CJN in a telephone interview from Los Angeles, responding politely to the same query for probably the umpteenth time. "But unlike Lawrence, the issues in the film are very much alive and close to the nerve endings of all of the populace, whether they be neo-Nazis, gentiles of goodwill or Jews.

"I couldn't believe the narrative authority that operated in the film. I was very impressed. It's a massive piece of work."

But how close is it to his book and the main character, who, on the page, was a much more three-dimensional character, warts and all?

"A film is not a video representation of a book. A film has such a different focus that it's almost inevitable a lot about it will be a drastic departure from the book.

"But within those obvious limits, I thought it was a magnificent film."

On the other hand, Keneally is quick to add that he would have changed "a few scenes," among them, the one in which Schindler breaks down in tears, wishing he had saved more of "his" Jews.

"The survivors say it wasn't in his character to break down," the author notes. "He already had a bulging factory. He was just about at his limit.

"But you can't be as subtle in a movie as in a book. I recognize there were certain dramatic imperatives behind that scene and I don't think it adds or subtracts from the film's authority."

And what of Oskar Schindler himself? He's depicted in the film as a womanizer and bon vivant but also as a cunning war profiteer who joined the Nazi party mainly to make a buck.

"Oh, he was a sincerely venal man," says Keneally, matter-of-factly, "but he was not a cruel man. From the start, he was not interested in having atrocities occur on his factory floor.

> Invoked some literary license

"He was not a linear human being. You couldn't add him up or resolve his motivation, even though it was obvious that pure altruism entered at a number of points. This made him very human."

Even more human, it seems, than the film shows. The "historical" Schindler made money from his Nazi connections, but at the same time betrayed SS secrets in Axis capitals like Vienna and Budapest and supplied information to various Resistance movements about the death camps. He also spent his money on food for his charges.

That was as he was boozing and cavorting with his Nazi buddies.

Keneally concedes having invoked some literary license for his book. Because he made up so much of the dialogue, he calls it, paradoxically, a "non-fiction novel."

There is even a story behind the two titles.

Keneally prefered Schindler's Ark, and the British publisher agreed.

But in the United States, the author recounts he was told the word ark could offend, as it implied that Jews went passively to the deaths, as animals being loaded onto an ark.

"I meant the word ark as in Ark of the Covenant — the covenent between Schindler and his Jews. But they [the American publisher] weren't having that."

Keneally also has his theories on why the film has been banned in several Muslim countries.

"Their perception is that by acknowledging the Holocaust, you're offering right-wing extremists in Israel a sanction for doing whatever they wish to Palestinians. [To them], mentioning the Holocaust is a Zionist act.

"I just don't subscribe to that philosophy, but it's powerful."

And it turns out Schindler's List is not the first book by Keneally to be made into a movie. A few years back, film buffs may remember an Australian rendition of his book, The Chant of Jimmy Blacksmith.

Now, the producers of the Irish film The Commitments are interested in making a film version of Keneally's Flying Hero Class, while the British duo of Merchant and Ivory, best known for Howard's End and Remains of the Day have teamed with Australia's Peter Weir to base a film on Keneally's Playmaker.

But it was the story of Oskar Schindler — as only a writer could put it — "that came raveling out at me from the undergrowth, and grabbed me."

Racism poses a threat to B.C. society: MLA

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Racism, prejudice and discrimination are threatening the very fabric of British Columbia society; it is incumbent on legislators "to destroy this cancer," Vancouver MLA Bernie Simpson told the B.C. legislature recently.

The only Jewish MLA in the house, Simpson said hate literature and racism "are rearing their ugly heads" in nearly every B.C. riding. Literature denying that the Holocaust happened has been distributed at the University of British Columbia. The Aryan Resistance Movement, based in Mission, has white power as its stated political aim, and they "intend to achieve it irregardless of what it might take to do so," Simpson reported.

The Phoenix Journal, which operates in the Parksville area (north of Victoria), promotes the idea that the Holocaust is a trillion-dollar lie and says that hidden historical evidence proves the Holocaust did not exist, the MLA continued.

He referred to other hate organizations which, he said, attack not only Jews but blacks, Sikhs, Pakistanis, Chinese and other minorities.

Simpson called on all B.C. political parties to work together "to create a society free from racial discrimination. We must promote understanding between cultures and create a harmonious and tolerant environment in B.C. Our social and economic well-being depend on it."

Allan Warnke, Liberal MLA from Richmond, a Vancouver suburb, supported Simpson's views (Simpson is NDP) and said Canada is a multicultural society. "We believe that this is a basic tenet of Canadian society and our culture. On the other hand, it is necessary for each generation to relearn what it means to be a multicultural society. It is not enough just to say it is, and pay lip service to it. Quite the contrary: each generation has to learn where we have come from."

Warnke said "we should all be disturbed about the rise in anti-Semitism. It's always difficult to deal with. But by the same token that is what presents us with a challenge. We and every generation must respond to that challenge." He was optimistic that B.C. can deal with the problems of racism and hate and called on all the political leaders to cooperate in an effort to combat the situation.

Jewish values, traditions seen as key to continuity

'We no longer live in shtetl'

By LORI DENNIS
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — As parents, we worry about our children's education, about their bar or bat mitzvah and about their wedding day. But do we worry enough about giving them a strong Jewish identity? asks a Toronto Jewish community leader.

"We are no longer living in the shtetl where we could once be Jewish by sheer osmosis. Today, we live in an open, uncloistered world, which makes it much tougher to be Jewish and retain a strong identity," says Susan Jackson, Director of Community Services and Youth Activities for the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Addressing a crowd of about 300 at Adath Israel Congregation recently, in a Rosalynd Smith Memorial Fund Lecture called Back to The Future: Recapturing Judaism for the Next Generation, Jackson touched on the reasons why Jews today are struggling with how to be Jewish and how to pass Jewish values on to their children and grandchildren.

So just what does it mean to be a Jew today? "It used to be so easy," says Jackson. "Being Jewish used to be everywhere. In the people we associated with, in the food we ate, in the books we studied, in the language we spoke. But today, that's all changed. Now we have choices, so many choices, and being Jewish is not nearly as accessible."

Today we have what Jackson affectionately refers to as the bagel Jews — those of us who hang out at Jewish-style restaurants and view this as our mitzvah. Then there are those of us who join a shul and give to the building fund because we think this makes us Jewish. Then there are the three-day-a-year Jews who attend shul only on the High Holidays. "While these groups make up a large sector of our Jewish population, these are not the Jews that worry me. At least, in some way they are saying, 'I may not know who I am but I haven't forgotten who I am supposed to try to be,' " she says.

"It's the Jews who have forgotten their past, their ties to their families and their commitment to the future that worry me...My generation has the lowest affinity toward Israel of any other generation before it," says Jackson.

Referring to the past, Jackson said that we tend to glorify it, but the truth is that our grandparents worked hard in the shtetls and sought out America only to give their children what they did not have. In this land paved with gold, they wanted to raise little Americans. So their kids became doctors, lawyers, dentists and social workers. And these little Americans became so Americanized that they often grew up feeling embarrassed by their own parents, she says.

In the 1950s, the kids moved out to the suburbs and had kids of their own. But before long they felt that something was missing. Then "little shuls" began to pop up and we began our search for what our parents and grandparents left behind in the old country — a sense of community, of a shared past — the values that Jackson believes parents need to instill in their children to ensure the continuity of Judaism.

"If we evaluate what sticks with our children, we'll realize that it's not whether we send them to parochial school versus public school that will determine how Jewish they will be. While a good formal Jewish education is important, schools can't be held responsible for our children's upbringing. It's the example that we, as parents, set for our kids that they will carry for a lifetime. It's the informal education at home that really matters," she says.

"It's important to tell stories about their past and their heritage. We must give them a sense of belonging and positive Jewish memories.

"Jewish identity and continuity is about shared family meals, the traditions we observe together, the stories, and the rituals. I call them 'soft fuzzies.' These are the things that make an impact, the things that children remember and won't let go of.

"And we need to communicate — always. We have to spend time together as a family. Judaism has this great way of allowing us to get to know our kids — it's called Shabbat. It's the Friday night thing where we can sit down with our kids and say 'Hello, how are you after a long hectic week?' And don't forget the grandparents. They are an integral part of our children's lives."

As Jews, we adapt, change and survive. If not, we wouldn't be here today. We must remember that it's all out there for the taking. We just have to reach out and grab it."

Government leaders laud Israel on Yom Ha'atzmaut

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Three levels of government brought greetings at a reception in celebration of Israel's 46th Independence Day hosted by Consul General Dror Zeigerman and his wife Asia, at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

More than 500 guests were welcomed for Yom Ha'atzmaut by those in the reception line which included the Zeigermans, Vice-Consul Haim Waxman and his wife Amalia, Consul for Tourism Ruth Ben-Tsur and her husband Eddie, and Consul for Economic Affairs Benjamin Noy and his wife Edith.

Diplomats, politicians, Jewish and Christian clergy, and representatives of Jewish organizations toasted the State of Israel with Israeli wine. Israeli and Canadian flags acted as a backdrop.

In a brief ceremony, Elaine Ziemba, Ontario's minister of citizenship, brought greetings from Premier Bob Rae and the government of Ontario. She said that this was a "very significant" day for Ontario.

Mayor June Rowlands, who recently returned from her third trip to Israel where she participated in the 14th Jerusalem Conference of Mayors said, "I am struck over and over again with the absolute beauty of Jerusalem, the place that is totally unique anywhere in the world ... It is an inconceivable thought to me that Jerusalem should ever again be divided."

Rowlands, who is the first Canadian mayor to participate in the international Conference of Mayors, thanked the Jewish community in Toronto for the tremendous support they have given to Israel over the years "sometimes, when it wasn't very easy to do."

Speaking of the accomplishments of the State of Israel, Mike Harris, the leader of the Progressive Conservative party of Ontario, said he, his wife and 9-year-old son had returned from Israel the week before and they were impressed with "what has been accomplished out of desert — out of seemingly nothing." Speaking to representatives of the Israeli government, the opposition party, and the citizens of Israel, he said that they are "excited — and hopeful — and wanting peace."

He noted that all 130 representatives of the three parties in the Ontario Legislature, in a non-partisan way, celebrated Israel's 46th anniversary and offered their very best wishes for peace.

Speaking on behalf of Lyn McLeod, official leader of the Opposition, Monte Kwinter (Liberal — Wilson Heights), spoke of the Holocaust and the movie, Schindler's List. He cited the scene when Schindler's children were told there was nowhere for them to go because they were hated in the east and the west. Then dramatically, the film, which was shot in black and white, turns to color and the survivors are shown coming over the horizon to the State of Israel. "That, my friends," said Kwinter, "is an idiom of what has happened in Israel."

He added that many people say that Israel was created as the result of the Holocaust. "I just want to make sure you remember that if there was an Israel, there would not have been a Holocaust."

In her emotional greetings from the Ontario region, Canadian Jewish Congress chair Gerda Frieberg also referred to Speilberg, saying that the message of the film is that the 350,000 survivors of the Shoah should speak about the Holocaust and the rest of the population should listen.

"We must instil a pride in our children. We must tell them how it was when there was no Israel so they can appreciate what we have today." She emphasized that "our goal is to support Israel."

Zeigerman spoke of the challenge of building a home for every Jew who wishes to live in Israel. The consul general stressed that a united Jerusalem will forever be the capital of Israel, that we must strengthen the struggle for peace and the readiness for compromise in achieving peace, and the importance of secure borders for the State of Israel.

He concluded with the hope and a prayer that "next year, on this day, the government representatives of Syria, Jordan, Lebanon and other Arab states will be among us."

School violence tops Jewish student concerns

Inter-religious dating a non-issue

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Violence in the schools proved to be more worrisome than inter-religious dating to about 100 students and seniors who took part in an intergenerational forum at Bernard Betel Centre recently.

When one student said an Ottawa survey showed 21 per cent of students were taking weapons into their schools, cries of "that's too low," came from many others.

"Inter-religious dating was a non-issue with the students at the workshop," said Judith Egelnick, one of the organizers.

In schools with a multicultural population, inter-religious and inter-racial dating is becoming more common, Jessica Silverberg of Thornhill Secondary School told a workshop with 20 students and 12 seniors, with many of the students from Nelson A. Boylen C.I.

Uri Grinwald of Thornhill Secondary School said the Young Offenders Act is too lenient and needs to be revised. The policy of "zero tolerance" raises problems for affected students who are kicked out of school, he said, noting that even adult criminals behind bars are allowed to continue their education.

"Some students felt parents should be responsible for preventing their children from taking weapons to school, while some seniors thought the students had to exercise responsibility for their actions," said Reta Duenisch-Turner, workshop monitor and chair of the conference.

"When a few students said shoplifting and stealing cars was fun, a couple of seniors asked where was the sense of pride in such students," organizer Sheila Zane said.

Seniors showed great concern when one Thornhill student, Joseph Castro, said he had to work more than 20 hours a week because he was on his own and it was interfering with his studies.

A teacher from Thornhill High, Sue Hannah, said four out of 10 students are employed, and there is a higher drop-out rate among students who have to work more than 20 hours a week.

Some students said many of their peers were afraid to report violence against them and this is one of the reasons violence is increasing in the schools.

At the intergenerational panel were seniors (from left) Morris Farshin, Miriam Meiri, Reta Duenisch-Turner, Rose Cherry and Thornhill Secondary School students Jessica Silverberg, Uri Grinwald, Dana Holmes, teacher Sue Hannah and Joseph Castro.

Bringing the students and seniors together was a great success and students have asked for further meetings of this kind, said Duenisch-Turner. The conference attracted far more applications to attend from students than could be accommodated, she said.

In addition to the schools named above, students from Thornlea High School, Sheridan College, Centennial College and Humber College attended.

Scarborough board says no to change in school year

TORONTO — The Scarborough Board of Education last week refused to delay the start of the next school year in order to accommodate Rosh Hashanah.

The academic year is scheduled to begin Sept. 6. Rosh Hashanah will fall on Sept. 6 and 7, and Jewish organizations have been asking school boards to delay the first day of classes until Sept. 8 to accommodate Jewish students and staff.

Karen Mock, national director of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, urged the board to respect the beliefs of Jewish students and the roughly 300 Jewish teachers and other staff in Scarborough.

Starting the year on Sept. 6 would force Jews to choose between their faith and school, while Jewish students would be placed at an unfair disadvantage if they missed the key first two days of classes, Mock argued.

So far, four of six Metro school boards have decided to open school Sept. 8. Late last month, the York Region Board also voted to start on the 8th, after pleas from B'nai Brith and Canadian Jewish Congress.

Start delayed

Several school boards in urban areas across Canada have also voted to delay the start of school to Sept. 8. Boards have been told that the coincidence of Rosh Hashanah and the first days of school is virtually a once-in-a-lifetime occurrence.

Mock said she was disappointed by the decision. She told The CJN the board probably feared "caving in" to Jewish concerns.

"I was hoping they would see the broader picture," she said.

Scarborough board chair David Horrox said the conflict with Rosh Hashanah had been considered but that "people in Scarborough have come to expect school will start on the first day after Labor Day [Sept. 6]. We did not feel we should tamper with that."

He said the board will make efforts to accommodate Jewish pupils and staff.

Congress and B'nai Brith are expected to make submissions to the Etobicoke Board of Education this week on the same matter.

Goodman concert set

TORONTO — Trio Lyra is dedicating their latest concert to the memory of Hyman Goodman, former concert master of The Toronto Symphony Orchestra and father of trio member Erica Goodman.

Flutist Suzanne Shulman, viola player Mark Childs and harpist Goodman formed Trio Lyra in 1978. They perform works from the baroque to the best of today's composers.

The May 8 Beth Tikvah program will include commissioned works by Ben Steinberg, Milton Barnes, Srul Irving Glick, Paul Ben Haim and a world premiere by Harry Freedman.

Refreshments will be served from 7:45 p.m. while the audience can meet the composers. The concert begins at 8 p.m. Tickets are $15, students and seniors $12.

Performances and tickets are at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, 3080 Bayview Ave. (416) 221-3433.

FRIDA KATZ, daughter, son-in-law, grandchildren and family in Canada and Israel wish to extend their heartfelt appreciation to friends, co-workers, JVS Staff and Leo Baeck parents and personnel for their warm support and sympathy, as they mourn the passing of Uri, their beloved husband, father and grandfather.

Holocaust educator Zilberman fascinated by trip to Germany

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A recent trip to Germany left Pnina Zilberman with very positive feelings, she told The CJN.

Zilberman, director of the Holocaust Remembrance Committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, recalls that on her one prior two-day visit to Munich and Dachau, she "could hardly wait to leave."

This time Zilberman spent two weeks in the country as a guest of the German government, staying five days in Berlin for an international scholars' conference on the Holocaust (Remembering for the Future) and visiting Jewish sites of interest around the country.

"I wanted to attend [the conference] because it took place in Germany," said Zilberman in her office adjacent to the Holocaust museum in the Lipa Green Building. She wanted to show her support for Germans who are working on Holocaust education and commemoration, she added.

Holocaust education is not compulsory in Germany, Zilberman said. "The bottom line," she said, "is the same as here. If the teacher is comfortable with it, it is taught. It seems that now they are much more open with it. The attitude is, 'We have to talk about the issue of the Holocaust and deal with it'."

In fact, she noted, German teachers have the opportunity to participate in government-sponsored trips to Israel where they visit Yad Vashem, meet with children of Holocaust survivors and "get a feeling of what Israel is all about." Eight such groups will visit Israel this year, Zilberman reports.

Zilberman finds it interesting that although Germany has a Jewish population of 42,000, Jewish museums and concentration camps are state-owned and run in most cases by non-Jews.

She looks forward to collaborating with the staff of the former Ravensbruck concentration camp, who are seeking survivors of the camp to provide further historical information about the camp.

Ravensbruck, located in the former East Germany, served as a Russian army base following the war. Many of the original structures, such as the homes of SS officers, the jail and the crematorium, are still intact, Zilberman said. Restoration of the camp is being funded by the local government. Target date for completion is April 30, 1995, to mark the 50th anniversary of Ravensbruck's liberation.

Next April is also the expected publication date for a Bergen-Belsen memorial book which will list survivors as well as those who died at the camp. It will also list the names of those born at Bergen-Belsen after it became a DP camp following the war.

Zilberman was struck by the number of small "satellite" concentration or labor camps she heard of while in Germany. Ravensbruck alone had 34 such camps, she noted.

"Everywhere you go [in Germany], you hear, 'Yes, out of town there was a little labor camp.' We know only of the major camps," she said.

Zilberman was heartened by German solidarity rallies for the Jewish community following the bombing of the synagogue in Lubeck shortly after she returned. Although the incident itself distressed her, she reminds herself, "Fifty years ago, nobody rallied for the Jews."

Anyone who would like to provide names for the Bergen-Belsen memorial book or information about Ravensbruck can do so by contacting Zilberman at (416) 635-2883.

Zilberman has also offered to serve as a liaison for former residents of Frankfurt who would like to be invited for a 50th anniversary get-together next year and for Berlin's Jewish Secondary School to facilitate contact with schools here.

Spouses in debt: can they take your house? (second of two parts)

In my last column I examined the Family Law Act as it relates to debtor-creditor laws, and the circumstances under which creditors could seize (and could not seize) the home of an indebted spouse. Briefly, houses that are jointly registered in the names of both spouses are fair game for creditors seeking repayment, while houses registered solely in the name of the non-debtor spouse are not. (See The Canadian Jewish News, April 14/94 p. 32 for full details). There are a few significant exceptions, however.

The first exception deals with "fraudulent conveyances" under Ontario's Fraudulent Conveyances Act. If the creditors can prove that the debtor spouse transferred his interest in the home to his spouse with the intent to defeat, hinder, delay, or defraud a creditor of monies owing to them, then the creditors can reverse the transfer. They can then sell the property and seize the debtor spouse's equity that the Court had previously declared was really his or hers, notwithstanding how the property is registered. In other words, effective ownership supersedes registered ownership.

Intent to defraud creditors is difficult to prove, however, particularly if the debts were incurred after the transfer. If the house was originally purchased in the wife's name alone, then proving the "intent" is usually very difficult.

Furthermore, under Canada's Bankruptcy Act, any transfer of the matrimonial home in the five years preceding the bankruptcy could be overturned if the debtor spouse was unable to pay all of his or her debts without the aid of interest in the home that he or she transferred at the time.

Any transfer in the year preceding the bankruptcy is regarded as particularly suspicious, unless the transfer was made "in consideration of marriage" (i.e. before or at the time of marriage). "Collusive" arrangements designed to defeat creditors will not work, however. The courts are leery of "creative transfers". Like seasoned veteran defencemen, they know all the moves of the "forwards" who try to go around them.

On that note, we wish the Maple Leafs well in their quest for the Stanley Cup, and may no one lose their home (or their shirt!) in this or any other process.

Educator says children must first be taught how to think

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Teaching children how to think — not what to think — can serve as a buffer against sexual promiscuity, drug abuse and suicide when they reach their teens, says parenting expert Barbara Coloroso.

The Colorado-based educator and mother of three teenagers spoke recently on Winning at Parenting at Adath Israel Congregation. Her talk was sponsored by UJA Women's Campaign, the Business & Professional Women's Network, Jewish Women's Federation and the Board of Jewish Education.

"I firmly believe that if you let kids make mistakes when they're cheap [when children are younger and the consequences are less serious], they'll rarely make the expensive ones later," Coloroso told a capacity crowd of over 1,300 people.

Coloroso emphasized the importance of allowing children to experience the consequences of their choices, as long as they are not life threatening, morally threatening or unhealthy.

A compliant child will be vulnerable to peer pressure as a teenager, Coloroso warned. Children need to learn to solve their own problems, she stressed. She recommended teaching children that "there is no problem so great it can't be solved." She distinguishes "problems" from "realities," the latter of which cannot be changed.

"We can't make anyone do anything they choose not to do," Coloroso said, "[but] we can make it more comfortable for them to behave more responsibly."

One of Coloroso's tenets is not to treat a child in a way in which an adult would not want to be treated. "If it works and leaves both parties' dignity intact, do it," she advises. "But not just if it works."

Leaving a child's dignity intact is one advantage of discipline over punishment, she noted. "I believe punishment teaches kids to cover their butt," she said.

"I can hit any of you and you can file charges," she continued, "yet we can hit someone three times smaller than we are. Think about it."

Discipline shows children what they have done wrong and gives them ways to solve the problems they have created, Coloroso explained. "If it's not reasonable, simple, valuable and practical (RSVP), then it's probably a punishment."

Telling kids what needs to be done is "far better" than giving them an indirect message, she noted. Instead of saying, "Your sister got straight A's," Coloroso suggests saying, "I know you can try. Let's see what we can do to get your grades up next time."

She advises parents to "celebrate that the term is over" before even looking at a child's report card. "Then you may have to say, 'What are you going to do next term?' "

She noted that people communicate with their bodies, faces, eyes and tone of voice as well as with their actual words. She cautioned against giving conflicting messages, and mentioned that only 20 per cent of meaning is derived from spoken words.

"Kids need a strong backbone," Coloroso noted, adding that a family with a "backbone structure" provides limits as well as flexibility. She categorizes other family types as "brick wall" (dictatorships) or "jellyfish" (anything goes).

A backbone family lets kids know it's okay to make mistakes, said Coloroso. "What you need [when you have a problem] is a good plan, not an excuse," she said.

A "brick wall" response, such as calling a child "klutzy," implies that "when you have a problem, you are a problem," said Coloroso. A "jellyfish" response teaches the child that "when you have a problem, it's someone else's fault."

Kids need six "critical life messages" every day, Coloroso said: I believe in you, I trust in you, I know you can handle it, you are listened to, you are cared for, and you are very important to me.

Coloroso is the author of the recently published Kids Are Worth It! Giving Your Child the Gift of Inner Discipline.

Child abuse on the agenda

TORONTO — The subject of child abuse will be addressed during a public lecture by Dr. Avraham S. Abraham, medical director of Shaare Zedek Medical Centre in Jerusalem, to be held May 3.

The lecture, titled The Medical and Halachic Aspects of Child Abuse: The Role of Parent, is co-sponsored by Chanoch Lanaar Institute, Jewish Family & Child Services and the Va'ad HaRabbonim of Toronto. It starts at 8:45 p.m. at the Agudath Israel Congregation of Toronto, 129 McGillivray Ave.

Abraham is the author of a number of books including the Comprehensive Guide to Medical Halacha, and lectures at the International Conference on Jewish Medical Ethics held annually in New York City.

While in Toronto, Abraham will meet with the JF&CS professional staff, teachers, principals and rabbis to discuss collaborative efforts in dealing with child abuse.

Holocaust remembrance service unites Moncton's Jews, non-Jews

By JOAN SICHEL
Special to The CJN

MONCTON — A discussion about Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List was the hook that drew a record crowd of 200 people to Moncton's ninth annual Holocaust memorial service.

Instead of a traditional Holocaust memorial program, students and educators from local high schools, universities and colleges were invited to make presentations to an interfaith audience in the Tiferes Israel Synagogue hall.

The underlying goal of the event, beyond public Holocaust remembrance, is education, and it succeeded by bringing together Jews and non-Jews.

Mark Fraser, a graduating science student at Mount Allison University in Sackville, shook his head sadly from the platform and said, describing his reaction to Schindler's List, "I can't believe the human race is capable of this."

Fraser, who has taken a number of courses in religion, described how talking about and studying the Holocaust was almost a taboo at school.

"It was a failure of our education system not to have taught me about it," he said.

In fact, Holocaust education is a part of the Modern History program in New Brunswick, but this course is not compulsory.

Dawn Hammermeister and Monica Doiron, both high school seniors, described their trip with their class to Washington, D.C., where they saw the new National Holocaust Museum. The Museum and the film both overwhelmed them. "We became attached to so many characters in the film, then we lost them all," said Doiron.

What most struck Dawn Hammermeister about the film, was the arrival at Auschwitz. "It looked like they were arriving in a snowstorm, but it was ashes from the chimneys filling the air."

"What is the value of one human being, one individual person?" asked Scott R. Mealey, a 24-year-old professional actor. He marvelled at Spielberg's cinematographic techniques.

Spielberg's movie praised

"We feel the film is incredibly real when we are watching in black and white" in contrast to the colorized versions of Hollywood we are accustomed to seeing.

Spielberg won't let us lose track of the individual in the massive numbers of victims. He showed us this with the only touch of color in the first part of the movie, the little girl in the red coat, her innocence, her insouciance — and later her body heaped with the dead on the cart.

"Even in the worst of life, there are good people; there's always hope," commented 17-year-old Kelly Redmond of Moncton High School. Schindler's moral ambivalence made her think. He was a German, a Nazi, and could have been killed for what he did. Yet in the end, he still felt he hadn't done enough, that he could have saved more. Yet he was in many ways not a moral man.

In the Encyclopedia of the Holocaust, Schindler is defined as a "saver of Jews." Lynn Robar of the Atlantic Baptist College asked if was he a hero. He began as an entrepreneur, an opportunist, self-centred and out to better himself. Soon he demonstrated he was also an alcoholic, a black marketeer and womanizer and con artist. He used his natural charm to better himself and soon was caught up in the madness of the time.

"But could he have done what he did if he hadn't been the kind of man he was?" asked John Sichel, a member of the congregation of Tiferes Israel. A German more honest or moral in his business dealings would not have survived to do what Schindler did. Could a more upright citizen successfully have connived and bribed and manoeuvered with Amon Goeth for "his" Jews?

Many of the speakers drew parallels between the lesson of the film and the racism and "ethnic cleansing" of Bosnia, Somalia, South Africa, and the Middle East today.

The memorial service based on Schindler's List left participants feeling, maybe it's time for ME to do something. Discussion continued informally even after the singing of K'El Maleh Rachamim and the recitation of Kaddish by Jack Brodie.

And many in the crowd joined Rabbi David Ellis for a tour of the synagogue.

Memorial recalls ghetto uprising

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jews in 22 smaller ghettos fought just as hard against their Nazi oppressors as did the heroic Jews of Warsaw, a meeting marking the 51st anniversary of the uprising was told.

The uprising enabled many Jews to escape the ghetto, and the house-to-house fighting was so fierce that there were still pockets of resistance in the ghetto as late as five months after the uprising started, Jason Berman said. "Nothing could be further from the truth that the Jews did not resist," he said. "The Warsaw Ghetto uprising was unsurpassed in human history."

The memorial was sponsored by the Workmen's Circle and the Jewish Labor Bund at the Workmen's Circle Centre.

Berman, a computer consultant, who a few years ago visited the death camps in Poland with his grandfather, Chaim Kuper, said he was disturbed on a recent visit to Washington's Holocaust Memorial to see grafitti against blacks and Jews and swastikas on phone booths and newspaper boxes in downtown Washington.

"There are a great many people working to create a climate of hatred toward Jews by reviving the work of Adolf Hitler," he said.

Twenty per cent of the American people still believe that the Holocaust is a hoax, said Louis Lenkinski, an officer of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

Candles were lit by survivors to honor the six million Holocaust martyrs, and a program of recitations and songs in Yiddish was presented. Artists taking part were Ethel Sum Cooper, Jenny Eisenstein and Michael Khinkis. The chair was Mark Rosenberg.

Rabbi Hartman to Jews: Don't worry — be happy

Content over continuity, says philosopher

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Rabbi David Hartman

TORONTO — Jews should stop worrying about whether their children and grandchildren will be Jewish and concentrate instead on making themselves better Jews, Rabbi David Hartman told a packed audience here last week.

The surest way to turn young people off Judaism, Rabbi Hartman warned, is to constantly fret about the latest buzzword in Jewish officialdom — continuity.

"Judaism is too important to have commissions on continuity. The issue is not continuity, but content. Continuity without content is meaningless. The content of the Jewish experience should be joyous and meaningful.

"But if the only thing you hear is — nebech — 'Will we survive?' that's the best way to keep people out. No one wants to join a sinking ship," Rabbi Hartman said in an emotion-laden address to over 1,000 people at Adath Israel Congregation.

Rabbi Hartman is co-founder and head of the Shalom Hartman Institute, a Jerusalem-based facility named for his late father, which combines Torah and advanced Judaic studies with a philosophy that advances religious pluralism and tolerance.

Time magazine has described him as "perhaps Israel's paramount religious philosopher."

But he good-naturedly shook off that cloak in his talk.

"I'm not a philosopher," he insisted. "I'm a yeshivah bocher."

Whatever his avocation, Rabbi Hartman issued some stiff advice: stop the hand-wringing over Jewish continuity and start injecting some real Yiddishkeit into life, now.

"Start living as Jews. Stop worrying about your children and grandchildren; that's the worst thing you can do. Worry about who you are. Be happy with what's available now.

"We will destroy Jewish continuity by every day we don't enjoy Judaism."

The problem extends even to Israel, but in a different way, he added.

"The trauma here is 'Will we survive?' Our trauma in Jerusalem is, 'How will we survive, who will we be and what type of Jews are we producing — old and classical or a new generation of Israelis?' "

That new generation, as well as the current one, was "ashamed" of the actions of Baruch Goldstein, the militant Jewish settler who gunned down at least 30 Palestinians at the Hebron mosque in February.

Goldstein "lived in a world of us versus them," and killed Arabs who were "praying to the G-d of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob."

Following the massacre, many Jews entered a period of intense soul-searching, he said. The current government commission of inquiry is a result of "something deep within our people — the collective responsibility of one for the other, to show the world the prophetic dream of justice."

The task at hand, Rabbi Hartman said, is to prevent Goldstein's thoughts and motivations from gaining public acceptance.

Asked about trading land for peace, Rabbi Hartman said, "The most important thing is not how much land we have, but how much soul and Torah we have. As much as I love the land, I love peace more. So I'm willing to try to build a way for Arabs and Jews to live together."

Rabbi Hartman, once spiritual leader of Montreal's Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem Synagogue, delivered the inaugural Sol Lederman memorial lecture, sponsored by the Shalom Hartman Institute and United Israel Appeal (UIA) of Canada.

Lederman, who died last November, was the other founder of the Shalom Hartman Institute, as well as a former president of UIA Canada and of the Canadian Friends of the Shalom Hartman Institute.

Most teen dieting unnecessary

TORONTO — Too many teenagers are dieting unnecessarily according to a prominent Toronto specialist in adolescent medicine.

Dr. Diane Sacks says two-thirds of the Jewish adolescent population and 50 per cent of Jewish pre-teens — mostly girls — are subjecting themselves to needless dieting.

Dr. Sacks, who will be one of the speakers May 5 at a Jewish Women's Federation Forum at Beth Tzedec Congregation, blames parental role models for a teenager's obsession with forsaking food.

"The mothers are often doing the same thing," she points out.

She advises teens, pre-teens and their parents to avoid slick, glossy, fashion-oriented magazines that consider slimness sacred. "Don't buy them," she counsels bluntly. "The people inside are air-brushed and unreal."

From her practice, Dr. Sacks knows only too well the symptoms and dangers of obsessive dieting. She constantly sees young women who eat no breakfast and throw away their lunch.

"It's a very important growth time, and their eating behavior may restrict that growth. They could be lacking in zinc, magnesium and iron, which, when lost, are hard to get back."

Eating disorders are common among Jewish females, she says, partly because of the difficulty kids face in meeting their parents' expectations.

Financial abuse of elderly documented as real problem

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Women tenants who made long distance calls at their landlord's expense were guilty of financial abuse of an elderly man, a panel at the Wagman Centre on elder abuse was told recently.

The landlord, born and raised in a prison camp and with a below-average IQ, was left some property by his father but had so much difficulty collecting the rents he was in danger of losing the building.

"Unfortunately, he couldn't resist the women," said Dr. Michel Silberfeld, competency clinic co-ordinator at Baycrest Centre.

He recalled a case in which an elderly man became friendly with a young woman who asked to take control of the man's finances. "We felt unquestionably there was undue influence," Silberfeld said. "So we conferred with the public trustee and the man was declared financially incompetent."

In another case, a son refused to give up his power of attorney for his elderly mother, even though the mother asked him to. "At our request the public trustee's office is pursuing the son," said Silberfeld, who is a psychiatry professor at the University of Toronto.

In interviewing an elderly man who wanted to make a subsantial gift to a Jewish foundation, he said it was determined the man was not competent to manage his affairs bcause he didn't understand documents in his brief case and he was unable to account for large sums of money and sale of property.

In turn this led to the discovery that a real estate developer had purchased the man's property for a fraction of its worth. "The public trustee is now involved and is taking action to recover the assets," Silberfeld said.

He deplored the practice of some charitable organizations to get donations from people when they are not competent to manage their affairs.

There is a lack of "real hard data" on financial abuse of the elderly, he said, but noted that in his own study of 300 cases over a six-year period ending in 1994, only five per cent involved financial abuse.

In those cases where there was financial abuse, it was relatives or friends who were involved 90 per cent of the time.

Silberfeld suggested that "a new theory of famly justice or intergenerational justice" is needed in the criminal code. "What does one generation owe another generation, especially when a very wealthy person says, 'I didn't inherit this money, I earned it all and I'm going to spend it all.' "

The case of a niece who appeared out of nowhere and defrauded her elderly aunt of $100,000 in six months was related by Police Const. William Steed of the Community Relations Division.

"This niece acted closer than a son or daughter and the situation was brought to our attention by the nursing superintendent," Steed said. "We checked her bank account and found money being transferred back and forth. She was lucky she didn't lose it all."

But when the case against the niece and her husband (they bought a cottage up north with part of the money) came to preliminary trial, it was dismissed because the judge said the aunt was not coherent enough to be a proper witness.

"The more money there is, the more likelihood of problems with financial abuse of the elderly," said Dr. Carol Cohen, staff psychiatrist at Sunnybrook Health Science Centre.

Four of 100 elderly persons in Ontario are subject to abuse, said Prof. Elizabeth Podnieks, faculty of nursing, Ryerson University. She said there is a "high correlation" between spousal abuse and elder abuse.

"There is a glaring lack of research on the relationship of ethnic and cultural traditions to abuse of the elderly," she said.

Baycrest Centre psychiatrist Dr. Susan Lieff was panel chair.

Baptist teacher helps Moncton preschool thrive

The children learn the kosher rules, make kiddush, drink grape juice, and eat challah on Fridays, and sing songs. They take part in Purim spiels and Chanukah plays. The parents and grandparents attend their concerts in the social hall. These families can feel only positive about the Jewish people, culture and religion after bringing their kids to the shul daily.

The Jewish preschool has never turned away any child for financial reasons, and has been a welcome place for those physically or mentally handicapped.

If we didn't run things this way, our kids would have no chance at all for a Jewish preschool experience. That's how we make it work in our small community, hundreds of miles from the nearest large centre. And through all of this, teacher Richardson has been the constant. She has worked through struggles with four rabbis with different ideologies, and zero population growth.

90th birthday marked

SAINT JOHN, N.B. — Rose Freedman, an active member of the Saint John community, will be honored at the Shaarei Zedek Synagogue here on April 16, on the occasion of her 90th birthday.

Sometimes referred to as an unpaid social worker, Freedman has extended a helping hand to many people and organizations since she arrived in the city in 1923. Born in Hillsboro, N.B. in 1904, she moved to Saint John as a new bride at the age of nineteen.

Rose Freedman

Her community involvement has been extraordinary: She is a past president and founding member of Kiwanis Ladies, as well as a founding member of the cerebral palsy school and Big Sisters, and co-ordinator of canvassing for the Heart Fund. She has been vice-president of the Red Cross and a driver for Meals on Wheels. She organized shelter for immigrant families arriving at the West Saint John immigration sheds after World War II.

Freedman has been a long-time member of Hadassah, involved in many projects for Hadassah-WIZO. She is the founder and first president of the Shomer Club, the first Jewish seniors club in the Atlantic provinces. She has also been chair of the Ladies Division Israel Bonds many times and was instrumental in affiliating with the Eastern Canada branch of the Women's League of United Synagogue.

Her husband of 40 years was the late Jack Freedman, also a leader in the Saint John Jewish Community. She is the mother of four, grandmother of 12 and great grandmother of 20.

BAYVIEW VILLAGE
SHOPPING CENTRE
(Bayview at Sheppard)
(416) 226-4140

You'd like to buy an exquisite piece of jewellery in impeccable, comfortable surroundings from someone you can trust. You want fabulous selection, old-fashioned service, and a reasonable price. But you can't have everything, can you?

Wrong, says Nathan Ricci, owner of Ricci Fine Jewellery in Bayview Village. And, if you can stop laughing long enough at his outrageous sense of humour, he will, indeed, show you that you can have exactly what you want at an affordable price.

Through a wearying recession that has claimed almost every major jewellery chain, this world-class, one-store operation (21 years in business, 10 in Bayview Village) continues to satisfy their loyal following with wedding bands and engagement rings, earrings, watches, and accessories. And they're doing it in a fabulously renovated store of rosewood and marble that might intimidate you if you hadn't actually shopped there.

What's their secret?

It starts with quality. You can count on the finest 18K and 14K Italian gold, which Ricci imports directly, resulting in savings that many other stores can't offer. The gold and other precious stones are then fashioned into the original and custom designs that account for a large portion of Ricci's business.

If your mother has a heart of gold (whose doesn't), why not give her one? Ricci has a lovely gold & diamond heart pendant for only $99.95. If she's an earring person, how about a pair of 14K gold cultured pearl earrings for only $39.95?

If you're looking for a bar/bat mitzvah or graduation present, Ricci has watches by Piaget, Cartier, Tag Heuer, Concord, Movado, and Seiko (all 30–50% off at present), as well as a fabulous selection of cufflinks and tuxedo dress sets. On a feminine note, there are literally hundreds of pairs of earrings to choose from in addition to necklaces in gold and silver. If you're searching for a birthday gift, Cartier accessories (perfumes, scarves, and sunglasses) are always a hit. And a fabulous selection of Seiko clocks will help anyone tell time elegantly and accurately.

Precious stones (diamonds, emeralds, sapphires and rubies) and semi-precious (amethyst, blue topaz and aquamarine) are available in a number of unusual settings that will ensure the uniqueness of your purchase. Wedding bands and engagement rings are a mainstay, and Ricci claims to have married "thousands of couples – with no divorces." (We'll take your word for it, Nathan).

Estate jewellery is a growing niche, and Ricci will soon devote a special section to it.

From small purchases to major ones, Ricci has something for everyone, in prices ranging from $50 to $100,000. Staff are friendly and attentive to all, regardless of price point. "I never want anyone to feel uncomfortable in my store," says Ricci.

He backs up this statement with a service that includes free cleaning on any jewellery purchased, free estimates on watch and jewellery repairs, and free battery testing. Skilled gemologists and repairmen are on the premises at all times to attend to your appraisal and repair needs. And of course there's Nathan's sense of humour, which may be worth all of the above on any given day.

Casual comfort.

Plazette

Discover the Difference

A Natural Approach

This springs fashion is devoted to ease and comfort. This trend is exemplified in pajama-like combinations of tunics, big shirts, long or short vests and long coats or dusters over skinny or wide-legged pants or versatile leggings. These items can be integrated in any number of combinations to create either a relaxed, casual look or dressed up a bit for a little summery elegance. Even business attire is relaxing to a new generation of suits with softer tailoring, fluid fabrics and shorter skirts or delicately shaped pants. Gone are the power suits of the past.

The warmer days and nights of spring bring with it the desire for crisp whites and bright, cheerful colours. The simplicity of all-white can be as dramatic as all-black or can be made to look soft, sweet and pure. And the new lush colour palettes of spring include purples, reds, and yellows. These colours can easily be mixed and matched with your already existing earth toned wardrobe. This new, natural approach to fashion is fun and best of all easy.

You can find all of these wonderful, exciting new styles and colours at Lawrence Plaza where you will also find everyday savings of 25 - 65 percent.

Look for the second issue of "Plazette" - the Lawrence Plaza Newsletter in your mailbox. You will find informative updates on stores in the centre and highlights of the fashion trends for the season. If you don't receive one in the mail, call (416) 789-1178 for a free copy.

Their gifts will make your Mother's Day

Every Mother's Day you face the same dilemma — What am I going to send Mom? Most years you draw a blank.

This year, we think we've found the answer. It's gift baskets and bags.

A lot of people are going to be sending them. And we encourage you to do the same.

Now we're not suggesting you send just any gift basket or bag. Some of them are simply not up to your standards.

What we are recommending is for you to order from someone you can trust, like Nutcracker Sweet.

Conveniently located in the quaint shopping district of north Avenue Road, Nutcracker Sweet has earned its reputation as Toronto's finest designer of distinctive gourmet gifts.

Each is a joyous celebration, overflowing with discriminately selected gourmet delicacies and tastefully accented with magnificent ribbons and bows.

Thousands of Toronto residents have been awed by the spectacle of receiving a Nutcracker Sweet gift. Thousands more have graciously received thanks for sending one.

If you're looking for a Mother's Day gift that's going to wow them, here's something to consider. Nutcracker Sweet has designed gifts specially for this event.

"This year our gifts are tastefully feminine," says Elaine Akler, owner of Nutcracker Sweet. "We've used delicate colors and wisps of decoration. And the treats are to die for!"

Akler adds, "If you want us to custom design a gift with your Mom in mind, we'd be happy to help out."

No wonder women like Barbara Bader of Willowdale are hoping they receive a Nutcracker Sweet Mother's Day gift. "Last year my son Larry sent me a Nutcracker Sweet basket," recalls Bader. "If I told you it took my breath away, I wouldn't be exaggerating."

It's also why people like Ryan Tannenbaum of Thornhill are sending them. "Mom, if you read this before Mother's Day there goes the surprise," jokes Tannenbaum. "But get ready for some great stuff. And don't forget to save some for me."

But Mother's Day is not the only day worth celebrating at Nutcracker Sweet.

Whatever the occasion, Nutcracker Sweet has it covered. From birthdays to get-wells to baby gifts to house-warmings, they have a customized gift for you.

They even make gift trays for shivas.

And isn't it comforting to know that every year Nutcracker Sweet designs exciting, new gift baskets, bags and trays for both Passover and Rosh Hashanah holidays? Including some for those who are Kosher or on low cholesterol diets.

For Mother's Day or any other day, Nutcracker Sweet is the answer to all your gift giving needs.

Nutcracker Sweet is located at 1936 Avenue Road, south of the 401. Call (416) 782-3232.

Food Festival is a feast for the senses

It'll be hands-on and how to. The perfect occasion to sip, sample, savor and shop. There will be plenty of food and fun at this year's Good Food Festival and, best of all, it's for the whole family!

Two hundred plus companies, home cooking, culinary and eating well experts are participating. There'll be hundreds of foods to taste and bushels of new and interesting products to buy.

There are 20 plus feature areas, each focusing on a different theme, five stages — and more than 100 free demonstrations and seminars! Here's a small sample of some of the activities you can enjoy:

The Showcase Kitchen is the Festival's main demonstration stage where well-known cooking personalities such as Anne Lindsay, Canadian Living's Elizabeth Baird, Chatelaine's Monda Rosenberg and Toronto Star food editor Marion Kane, will be serving up their culinary advice.

At Making Homemade Pasta sponsored by Cuisinart you'll find ongoing demonstrations on how to make pasta from scratch — from mixing and kneading the dough to making your favorite shapes.

At Great Grilling presented by Weber-Stephen, budding barbecue chefs can learn different techniques from roasting poultry to grilling vegetables, plus pick up some cleaning and maintenance tips.

Kids in the Kitchen is the spot for kids to enjoy learning the ABCs of food fun, the four food groups and Canada's Food Guide.

The Ontario Egg Producer's Marketing Board has sponsored the stage called Nutrition: Advice from the experts. Here professional dietitians will present seminars on a wide-range of nutrition topics such as Cholesterol: Fact & Fiction; Go For the Grains; Take the Fear Out of Food Labels; The French Paradox; and Let Food Be Thy Medicine.

At Taste of the Town you'll be able to see trend-setting restaurant chefs in action and taste their specialties, as well as sample some of the newest beer and wine offerings.

And that's just a taste! There is lots more to see, do and buy. The Festival will definitely be a food lover's delight.

It takes place at the Automotive Building, Exhibition Place, Friday, May 6 (noon-9 p.m.), Saturday, May 7 (9 a.m.-9 p.m.) and Sunday, May 8 (9 a.m.-6 p.m. Admission is $7.50 plus taxes per person and children under 12 are free. For more information, please call 778-6483.

Don't forget, Sunday is Mother's Day so why not treat your mother to a day at The Good Food Festival? It will be good food fun for everyone!

Mom won't keep mum about our gifts.

Who could blame her, when all of our Nutcracker Sweet Mother's Day gifts are bursting with scintillating sensations and wrapped in loving celebration? From bountiful savory baskets to decorative planters to luxuriously elegant fragrance baskets. Call us today. And experience why Mom's the word at Nutcracker Sweet.

MOTHER'S DAY

Fabulous eclecticism at great prices

The hallmark of today's look in home design is a combination of the classical and the unpredictable, the elegant and the playful, in a manner that reflects the owner's personality and lifestyle.

Perkins & Pape is a shop which understands this new eclecticism. Owners Nancy Perkins and Joan Pape Cohen recognize the richness that can be brought to a home by creating a collage that juxtaposes what was once considered to be incongruous styles and materials. Luscious damask sofas look fabulous with contemporary occasional pieces in glass and steel. Whimsically painted pine, the use of unexpected combinations such as bergere chairs done in canvas can add a light-hearted touch.

Unique and unusual

In their tiny shop at 365 Eglinton Ave. W., Perkins and Cohen have a display of the unique and unusual combined with the traditional, which is a mere sampling of the vast array of goods they carry. Most of the furniture they offer is displayed in the catalogues of the many manufacturers' lines that they represent. Floor samples give the customer concrete examples of the quality produced by each manufacturer so that selection from the catalogues can be done with confidence.

Emphasizes personal selections

By not holding a warehouse full of stock, they can let shoppers select the fabrics and finishes of their own choice. Their in-house designer can easily help them in putting together a look that is totally their own. An added bonus is the fact that they can offer great prices on fine quality home furnishings by keeping their overhead to a minimum.

If the look you're after is comfortable, personal, yet unforgettable, Perkins & Pape is the place to shop!

We concentrate on bottom lines as well as furniture lines.

Sometimes it seems the only options available when shopping for furniture are 'no money down' discount stores or overpriced snobby furniture boutiques. In the end you feel as if you are settling for low quality and limited selection from one or spending much more than planned from the other.

Perkins & Pape offers a refreshing alternative – quality fine furniture and accessories that are priced surprisingly less than you'll find elsewhere. Choose from elegant traditional styling to sleek contemporary and, if it's not in our showroom, you're sure to find it in our extensive selection of catalogues.

Whether you are searching for a sofa, table, chair, or bed, Perkins & Pape has the line of furniture for your home.

Perfect pampering for Mom

From the team of professionals who brought you the highly acclaimed health, beauty, nutrition and fitness programs of King Ranch comes a new kind of city spa.

HealthWinds Therapeutic Spa offers all the programs and services of a vacation spa right in the heart of the city.

"Life stresses have increased for many of us over the last few years," says Kailee Kline, owner of HealthWinds and former program director of King Ranch. "Today's economic realities mean that people have less time and fewer resources to get away to a spa. Many would like to feel the benefits of a spa vacation, but without leaving home. HealthWinds is Toronto's first therapeutic spa providing health, beauty, fitness and nutrition services under one roof."

HealthWinds believes that overall good health is attained by integrating four basic approaches, referred to as "the winds of wellness" — body care, skin care, nutrition care and exercise and stress relief.

Seven Body Care therapies are offered — Swedish Massage, Sports Massage, Reflexology, Shiatsu, Hydrotherapy, Aromatherapy and the Vistasp Method. Each has been created to repair, restore, regenerate, rejuvenate and relax you.

"The skin acts to protect the body and should be treated with the utmost respect," states Kline. "HealthWinds has devised four restorative Skin Care treatments to enhance the quality of your skin. Together with our aesthetician, you will determine the best treatment for your skin and choose either the Foundation Facial, Beauty Flash Facial, Non-Surgical Facelift or Lymph Drainage Facial."

Your outer beauty can be a reflection of the foods you choose to eat. Which is why HealthWinds dietitian Marsha Rosen will help you design a Nutrition Care program to enhance your individual needs. Combined with recipes and meals from HealthWinds Cafe and Head Chef, Mark Mogensen, you'll be offered workable and flavorful solutions.

The final key to attaining good health, Exercise and Stress Relief, is offered through a variety olf classes designed to leave you feeling relaxed and renewed. Whether it's the soothing approach of meditative relaxation, yoga or more intense muscle conditioning, classes are kept small for individual attention.

This Mother's Day, give Mom the very special gift of health. Treat yourself too. And join us for our "hard to believe it's low-fat" Mother's Day Brunch.

HealthWinds is located at 2401 Yonge Street on the Lower Level (LL01), one light north of Eglinton. Call (416) 488-9545.

Ms. Emma Designs:

A perfect fit

When you buy a dress, a skirt, pants or a jacket, the most important consideration should be the fit of the garment. At Ms. Emma's Designs, this is their first priority.

Ettie Starr, owner/operator of Ms. Emma Designs at 4967 Yonge St. in Toronto, says that, "no two women are shaped exactly alike and it is highly unlikely to walk out of a store with a perfectly fitting outfit. It may need a tuck here or there, or a simple hem adjustment. We pay strict attention to our customer's special needs. Ms. Emma's Designs are created in one size and may be enlarged for full figures or scaled down for petites. We are prepared to make these alterations at no additional cost and provide our customers with a customized fit.

Throughout it's 20 years in business, Ms. Emma Designs has maintained its reputation for providing original fashion designs using unique and exquisite fabrics in vibrant colors. This year is no exception. Hand woven silks, ikat, rayon and linens have been used by Ms. Emma to create limited editions of fashion separates and dresses for day and evening wear.

What a wonderful treat for your mother on her special day. A beautiful, custom-fit Ms. Emma Design to wear and enjoy always.

Kleinberg: quality craftsman

Before striking out on his own, Samuel Kleinberg worked fifteen years as a jeweler, learning every aspect of the business from gem appraisal to office management. His beginnings as an independent operator in 1968 were modest, in a tiny, two-man office on Eglinton near Bathurst. He was one of the first jewelers to wholesale to the public.

His reputation, established largely through word of mouth, helped the business outgrow the Eglinton location. In 1977, he moved to Lawrence Plaza. Growth has been continuous and diverse; his company now designs and manufactures its own rings, and sells to stores in Canada, the United States and the Caribbean. Kleinberg also imports diamonds, and carries a selection of specialized pieces from Italy.

He has a reputation in the industry for honesty, integrity, and offering quality craft work at the best possible price. In order not to compete with stores that bought from him, he used to refuse to advertise. His company has established a tradition of service; for example, he will help customers update their jewelry by remounting old pieces.

Selling jewelry that endures and is beautiful has brought customers back over 25 years. Sam Kleinberg offers his customers "A gift of love for Mother's Day that says 'I love you' every day."

Mall hosts holiday events

The Steeles West Value Mall, near Dufferin and Steeles, is made up of small independent businesses. It is community oriented, drawing customers from areas north of Steeles like Thornhill, Richmond Hill and Woodbridge. Concentration is on customer service and value for the dollar.

There are 60 stores offering a wide range of goods: clothing, electronics, houseware, used books, leather goods, bulk food, giftware, furniture, lingerie, sportswear, lighting and costume jewelry; also, there is a food court. There are two silk flower shops and two "dollar stores", as well as a hair salon. For children (and the convenience of their parents) there are two amusement rides. On weekends, there is an outdoor fruit market. The Steeles West Value Mall is open six days a week, including Sundays, with stores closed on Mondays.

The merchants are adopting a new policy of featuring some special event every week, such as a car wash or a barbecue. About once a month, there is also a big celebration for some holiday such as Mothers' Day or Canada Day. Sometimes, in keeping with the community orientation, there are charity events. Early in May, for example, the Mall will play host to the Shalom Festival.

Religious Zionists urged to defend political beliefs

'We're not fanatics,' says rabbi

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Religious Zionists must speak out and defend their beliefs to the wider Jewish community and the world, or risk being dismissed as a lunatic fringe, the rabbi of Manhattan's Lincoln Square Synagogue told a Toronto audience recently.

Addressing a gathering of parents at Netivot HaTorah Day School in Thornhill, Rabbi Simcha Weinberg spoke energetically about the need for religious Zionists to articulate publicly their positions on political issues facing Israel.

Rabbi Weinberg's lecture was titled The Agony and the Ecstacy: Facing the Practical Challenges of Building the Holy Land. It was co-sponsored by Netivot HaTorah and the Mizrachi Organization of Canada.

"Now [in the aftermath of the Hebron massacre] we're being defined as fanatics. What we have to do is define where we stand politically, and convince the world that there is a middle ground between Kach and those who have settled on the West Bank merely because the cost of housing is cheap."

According to Rabbi Weinberg, Hebron has changed the political landscape in a major way. "Everything changed on Purim day," he said. "Things changed in terms of what is being put on the bargaining table. We're torn in a way that we were not torn eight months ago, before the handshake [between Yitzhak Rabin and Yasser Arafat in Washington D.C. on Sept. 13]."

Rabbi Weinberg called the present time a "moment of definition for the religious Zionist community," but added, "We have a mission that extends far beyond what's happening now — far beyond Rabin or Hebron ... Our original obligation is to build the land and sanctify it. We can't allow our broader goals of Medinat Israel to be swept away."

Rabbi Weinberg urged parents not to speak of Israel with uncertainty in front of their children. "Remember the pride and joy of the 1967 War and Entebbe," he said. "Now everyone's depressed and walking around with a pekele (burden) on their backs. We don't know what's going on, and that's the message we're giving our children."

One week after Hebron, articles in the New York Times quoted Jewish Americans as saying, "Maybe we're not one nation anymore," Rabbi Weinberg noted. "There are images surfacing of a coming civil war, and the battle lines are being drawn," he said. "At a time that demands unity and harmony between Jews, we're divided."

He said that he was walking with his children in Jerusalem several months ago and came upon the sight of Israeli policemen hitting religious Jews. "My kids were shocked, they were shaken to the core." One of the most frightening photographs he has ever seen, he said, showed Israeli police barring a chassidic man from praying at the Western Wall.

Although it might be tempting to avoid taking a public stand in the increasingly vocal debate about Israel's future, Rabbi Weinberg said it was more important that religious Zionists stand up and be heard, even if they are "adding fuel to the fire.

"You have to do it anyways," he said. "Because what's happening is that we're allowing others to define ourselves for us. We could risk our very identity if we allow the television cameramen and journalists to define who we are by the kipot on our heads or the synagogues we attend.

"If we don't define ourselves, then we'll be blamed for everything that happens. Because you know who's being blamed for Baruch Goldstein, and you know that our religious schools are being called 'hotbeds' of extremism where future Kach members are being trained."

Religious Zionists who do not voice opinions because they are "frightened by extremes" may have chosen religious Zionism for convenience only, Weinberg said. "If it was chosen out of conviction, we could say where we stand," he said. "If our religion doesn't give us the means to define ourselves, then our religion is inconsequential."

80-year-old to join Baycrest walk

TORONTO — One of the highlights of the 1994 Baycrest Challenge will be the participation of an indomitable 80-year-old who has faced many challenges of her own.

Although her spine has become bent from fractures due to osteoporosis, Eleanor Mills can walk up to 13 kilometres daily with the help of walker chair.

Last year Mills began a cross-Canada trek to increase awareness about the bone disease that affects more than one million Canadians and to raise funds for research. Mills and her team (known as the Boney Express) started off in Victoria, B.C. and ended the first leg of the journey last fall in Toronto.

On May 8, Mills will officially begin the second half of her osteoporosis awareness campaign at the Baycrest Challenge, an annual run and walk event organized by Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. The Boney Express will continue its journey through communities from Toronto to their final destination, St. John's, Newfoundland.

Because the Challenge takes place on Mother's Day, everyone who pre-registers with their mothers for the 5-K walk before April 22 will receive a gift of flowers — mums for your Mom — plus a special gift at the finish line.

"We're all very excited and honored that Eleanor Mills will be starting her walk at this year's Challenge," says Enid Markson, who is co-chairing the event organized by the Men's Service Group of Baycrest Centre.

For more information or to register please call the Challenge Hotline — 256-2RUN (256-2786).

MS no barrier to UJA walker

TORONTO — Next month, when thousands of foot soldiers join the UJA Community March for Israel, one woman will be marching towards her own medical milestone.

Perla Arditti, who suffers from multiple sclerosis, will abandon her battery-powered scooter and walk the last lap. She's training four times a week to strengthen her leg muscles before the May 29 march.

Arditti, now 34, learned she had MS, a progressive nerve disease, when she was 22.

"When I was first diagnosed, I was able to walk without any assistance. As the disease progressed, I was paralyzed for eight months. Through a lot of therapy and determination, I managed to get past that," she said.

Therapy and determination fortify her, but an experimental drug developed in Israel, called COP-1, allows her to function independently.

Before Arditti began the daily injections, she experienced tingling and numbness in her feet and hands, and dizziness. "My head would spin like there was no return," she said.

Now Arditti lives alone in her own apartment and works with fellow MS sufferers at Jewish Family & Child Services.

Arditti hopes to collect $1,000 in contributions for the UJA march. She also hopes others with MS — even non-Jews — will join the march as well.

"A lot of people think I'm crazy," she said.

Jewish films on the agenda...

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Poland, the home of a magnificent Jewish community on the eve of World War II, is represented at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival by several films.

•On May 1 at 4:15 p.m., Just Beyond The Forest will be screened. It's about a Polish woman who takes a Jewish girl into hiding during the Holocaust.

On May 2 at 7:30 p.m., Birthplace traces the jolting journey of a Polish-born American Jew to the village of his youth.

•On May 3 at 9:30 p.m. 1968 — Happy New Year recreates the anti-Semitic purge which gutted the remnant of Poland's postwar Jewish community.

Just Beyond The Forest, directed by Jan Lomnicki, is set in 1942, a year before the Nazi liquidation of the Warsaw Ghetto.

Kuglac, a mercenary Polish washerwoman, agrees to spirit Rutka — a Jewish girl — out of the ghetto. She does it for money, fine clothes and jewels — certainly not out of philanthropy. But as their journey unfolds, her feelings change.

Just Beyond The Forest is an affecting, well-acted film which explores the multifaceted relationship between Poles and Jews during the Holocaust.

Birthplace, by the young Polish filmmaker Pawel Lozinski, uses a series of events which took place nearly 50 years ago to explore the reactions of ordinary Poles to Jewish suffering.

After an absence of decades, Henryk Grynberg, now an American citizen, returns to his village in attempt to unravel the mysterious deaths of his father and younger brother. While they perished, he and his mother somehow survived.

Grynberg knocks on villagers' doors and identifies himself. With varying degrees of emotion, they remember the past.

The Poles in Birthplace are a mixed lot, ranging from the indifferent to the caring, and their views encapsulate the attitudes of Poles toward Jews during the war.

1968 — Happy New Year, by director Jacek Bromski, is loosely based on events which led to the exodus of some 30,000 Jews from Poland.

After the 1967 Six Day War, the Polish Communist party leader, Gomulka, implied that Jews had shown disloyalty to Poland by backing Israel. This, in tandem with a student revolt in Warsaw, paved the way for a campaign of state anti-Semitism thinly disguised as anti-Zionism.

1968 — Happy New Year turns on a group of university students who've barricaded themselves in one of the campus buildings. The central figures are Agnieszka Bergman (Jolanta Jackowska), the daughter of a high-ranking Jewish government official, and Piotr (Henryk Kowalczyk), one of the student leaders who, it transpires, is also Jewish.

Wanted by the authorities, Piotr goes into hiding. Agnieskaza, his girlfriend, joins him. In short order, Jerzy, Agnieskaza's father (Krzysztof Kolberger) is removed from office. When he's summarily ousted, charges are levelled that "Jewish nationalists" are working against Poland's interests.

In exchange for agreeing to emigrate to Israel, Piotr is freed from captivity. Agnieskza, pregnant, decides to emigrate with him.

1968 — Happy New Year skillfully recalls an era that blackened Poland's name and effectively spelled finis to what had been a viable Jewish community.

David Rozenberg's portrait of a murderous French neo-Nazi, Deficiency, is chilling.

Scheduled to be screened at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival on May 2 at 9 p.m., it's based on a true story.

The protagonist, Roland Resse (Christophe Garcia), is a 25-year-old horticulturist. He is distant and awkward, something of a loner.

At his new job at a nursery, Resse meets a kindred spirit — a young, budding fascist with a penchant for tasteless, racist-based jokes, who claims that Jews "hide behind" French surnames.

With his encouragement, Resse joins an extreme right-wing political party, and immerses himself in neo-Nazi culture, incessantly posturing in front of a mirror.

Resse's kindly landlady, Mrs. Martin (Isabelle Sadoyan), is Jewish. When Resse makes this discovery, after overhearing her speak in Yiddish on the phone, he flies into an anti-Semitic rage, and ominously intones, "You are a Jew, even if you are nice."

What happens next is shocking, though not entirely surprising.

Deficiency makes its point all too clearly — neo-Nazism is a phenomenon that can only be ignored at one's peril.

EYE ON ARTS

Toronto Outdoor Art Exhibition (TOAE): May 2 is the application deadline for artists and full-time art students to participate in the 33rd TOAE, which occurs July 8 to 10. This, Canada's largest outdoor art event, has attracted more than 100,000 visitors to Toronto's Nathan Phillips Square in recent years. More than 500 artists are expected to pay $180 ($75 for students) to take part. Cash prizes for artists total $15,000.

Contact TOAE, 35 McCaul St., Suite 201, Toronto Ont. M5T 1V7. Phone 416-408-2754.

Celebrate May Day Concert: Renee Bouthot, a soprano who has performed numerous times at the Holy Blossom Temple, is performing a May Day recital with mezzo Kristine Anderson, Sunday May 1 in Walter Hall, Edward Johnson Building, University of Toronto, 8 p.m. The first half of the program includes works by Purcell, Bach, Brahms, Rossini and Mozart. The second half features 20th-century fare, including traditional Canadian folk songs and selections from the musical theatre.

Tickets are $15 ($10 for seniors and students), available by phoning (416) 588-4236. Bouthot recently formed a Jewish women's choir which is scheduled to perform at Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue in June.

Television taping: Moriah Multimedia and Magder Entertainment Corporation of Toronto are currently in production on a series of television shows entitled Issues and Answers, that will be broadcast nationally in Canada.

Being held on May 1, the taping will explore many topical issues such as free will, pleasure and love. Irwin Katsoff, executive director of Aish HaTorah, Los Angeles, will act as host and facilitate the program, as the audience delves into the significant role these issues play in our lives today.

Taping begains at 9:30 a.m. at The Electric Images Studio, 98 The Esplanade.

... Even more films at festival

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A mime forced to perform for the Nazis learns they are trying to dupe the world into believing Jews are treated royally in the Terezin camp.

Though this plot was unmasked long ago, it has taken nearly 50 years for a fictional film, The Last Butterfly, to provide real insight into the situation.

The 110-minute film will be screened May 3 during the Jewish Film Festival, 7:15 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema.

The 1990 Czech-English production stars British mime Tom Courtney and is based on a novel by Toronto's Michael Jacot. It has a strong supporting performances by Linda Jablonska, playing one of the Terezin children, and by English actors playing Jewish musicians pressed into service by the Nazis.

The Last Butterfly does not have the upbeat ending of Schindler's List. On the other hand, it is more effective in showing the day-to-day struggle of the Terezin Jews and their use of humor to overcome adversity.

Angst, the story of three comedians and second generation Holocaust survivors, is a most innovative and entertaining film despite its sombre background.

The 56-minute Australian film, in its Canadian premiere, is at the Festival on its closing night, May 5, at 8:15 p.m.

The three comedians are Deb Filler of New Zealand, who had a one-woman show in Toronto earlier this year; Austen Tayshus aka Alexander Gutman of Australia; and Moshe Aldoks of the United States. Directed by Australian Judy Menczel, it was shot on location in New Zealand, Australia, Boston, New York and Los Angeles.

It's unlikely you will ever see a film with a more original premise than Angst.

A more conventional treatment of the Holocaust is Jonah Who Lived in the Whale, a terrifying view from a 4-year-old boy who survives Bergen Belsen. It is based on Dutch physicist Jona Oberski's autobiographical best seller Childhood. Its Festival appearance May 1 at 6.30 p.m. is the English-language Canadian premiere, running 94 minutes.

This Italian-French production, directed by Roberto Faenza, traces the journey of an Amsterdam family to Bergen Belsen.

Jonah experiences the terror and dehumanization of his parents and fellow travellers but miraculously survives. His resilience and faith in the future affirm the central message of the film.

"Housework is the worst enemy of an artist. I don't care for it."

With these words, Reva Shwayder sets the tone for Young at Heart, one of three short films opening the Jewish Film Festival April 28 at 8 p.m.

Shwayder is an independent-minded woman in her 80s who at first says marriage is for young people, but then relents and marries another artist, Louis Gothelf, 85, after living with him for two years.

Shwayder doesn't arrive at the altar without paying her dues. The death of her "wonderful husband" was followed by the loss of two sons, both young, one to cancer and one during a scuba accident in Costa Rica.

"But I lived through it," she says. "Why mourn? Nobody wants to listen to your troubles."

Gothelf, who likes to paint portraits, lost his wife in 1983 "after she had Alzheimer's disease for 10 torturous years."

Shwayder says they met, sitting side by side, on a 747 flying across the Atlantic, and talked all through the flight about art. In England they were booked at the same hotel. "Louis had a wonderful room overlooking the ocean and I had a closet. I moved in with him and we became friendly."

Art, as we know, can impart powerful impulses. This is clearly evident in two documentaries to be screened May 2 at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Art and Remembrance: The Legacy of Felix Nussbaum and Unknown Secrets: Art and the Rosenberg Era grapple with completely different topics, but both convey raw and startling emotions.

Nussbaum was a German Jew, a native of Osnabruck, who produced a major body of paintings on the plight of Jews during the Holocaust.

A widely-praised artist in Weimar Germany, he fled to Brussels after the rise of Hitler. As filmmaker Barbara Pfeffer points out, going into hiding did not stop him from painting.

In the summer of 1944, Nussbaum and his wife, Felka, were arrested, and dispatched to Auschwitz. Nussbaum was only 39 when he died.

Thanks to a Belgian doctor to whom he had given his paintings for safekeeping, they survived. Years later, Nussbaum's cousin, Gustel Moses, brought them to Osnabruck for an exhibition.

The paintings, which portray the effects of exile, anxiety and fear, were restored by the townspeople.

A riveting documentary, Art and Remembrance ends in Berlin with high school students discussing Nussbaum's paintings, anti-Semitism and the Holocaust.

In June 1953, Julius and Ethel Rosenberg were executed in the United States, having been found guilty of passing atomic secrets to the Soviet Union.

To this day, their case remains a cause celebre.

Unknown Secrets, which is directed by Daniel Keller, Charles Light and Rob Okun, is based on a 1988 touring art exhibit on the relationship between art and politics.

Unknown Secrets doesn't divulge any. But it is a useful primer of a bygone era which a lot of people would rather conveniently forget.

Gossip: The Power of the Word by Stephen M. Wylen KTAV Publishing $19.95 (US)

The Talmud reminds us that the person who slanders hurts three people: the person slandered, the person to whom the slander is uttered and himself. The Talmud also asserts, "Slander is worse than weapons, for weapons hurt from near, slander from afar." And an old saw has it that whoever gossips to you will gossip about you.

Jewish law defines two categories of forbidden speech: lashon hora (malicious speech) and rekhilut (talebearing). The former refers to things forbidden to say, the latter to repeating these things to others.

The author, a rabbi in Scranton, Pa., has written a wise and helpful book about the multiple dangers of gossip. In cautioning us how to guard the words of our lips he derives wisdom from the wellsprings of Jewish tradition. He makes clear that even in ordinary discourse there are the pitfalls of false judgement, half truths and malice.

Making effective use of examples from common experience, Rabbi Wylen extends the notion of proper speech to include such matters as offering words of consolation, responding to hatred or unwarranted rebuke and reacting verbally to prejudice.

In a final chapter, he suggests over 50 rules about gossip and slander. Typical among them, "you are under no obligation to reveal the unknown misdeeds of others," and "decline to give an opinion when you cannot be objective on account of a personal grudge or bad experience."

It would take a saint-like personality to live up to all the author's strictures, but his book is a splendid expansion of the Midrashic story of Rabbi Gamaliel who told his servant to buy the best meat in the market The slave brought home a tongue. The next day the rabbi asked him to buy the worst thing in the market and again the servant brought home a tongue, wisely saying, "There is nothing better than a good tongue, and nothing worse than an evil one."

Tax Revenues Jump

ISRAEL — Tax revenues jumped 10 per cent in the first quarter of the year, reflecting vigorous economic activity, although the pace slackened somewhat last month due to seasonal factors, State Revenues Director Yoram Gabbai reported.

Last month, tax revenues totaled NIS 5.8 billion, representing a 4 per cent real increase compared to March last year.

During the first quarter, revenues reached NIS 17.6b. When the figures are adjusted for the NIS 260 million in lost revenues due to legislative changes, they reflect a 12 per cent increase from the first quarter of 1993.

During the first quarter, income tax revenues rose 16 per cent.

Value Added Tax (VAT) and customs receipts fell 5 per cent last month to NIS 2.5b. In the first quarter, VAT and customs receipts totaled NIS 8b., a 3 per cent rise compared to the same period last year. Excluding legislative changes and adjusting for seasonal factors, receipts actually increased 8 per cent, reflecting economic expansion.

Japanese Investors

TEL AVIV — The Tokyo Stock Exchange is considering making the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange an approved exchange for Japanese investors, says the Israel-Japan Chamber of Commerce.

Tokyo's approval of the TASE is necessary for allowing Japanese institutional investors the right to hold Israeli shares in their portfolios.

The Israel-Japan Chamber of Commerce initiated the process last November, when a capital market delegation it sponsored met with the leaders of the Tokyo Exchange.

Japanese investment banks are showing great interest in the local stock market, as well as in the shares of Israeli companies traded in New York.

According to the chamber, the Japanese interest stems both from economic considerations - such as the economy's high growth rates - and from the perceived economic benefits of peace in the region.

No Global Competitive Edge

ISRAEL — Israel still not competitive in world markets: The country's ability to compete in world markets has not improved in the past year, according to the annual report of the Israel Institute of Productivity.

The report notes the country's trade deficit is growing, with imports increasing at the rate of one percent a month (not including diamonds). Exports during the second half last year stood at the same level as during the first half. This bodes ill for the prospects of economic growth, the report says.

Institute director-general Yosef Duriel said the "investment balance" also continues to be negative, as more dollars are leaving the country for investment abroad than are being invested here by foreigners.

The following briefs were supplied by Israel's Economic Mission, (416) 961-1242 in Toronto.

Premier Business Conference

TORONTO — Ontario Premier Bob Rae highlights a high-powered conference on business opportunities in Israel, scheduled for next month.

Program co-ordinator Meir Klein describes it as "larger than any previous event of this kind in Canada." A joint venture of the Israel Economic Mission, the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce, and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, it is designed to encourage Canadian participation in Israeli business life.

Other scheduled speakers include executives from Canadian based Claridge-Israel, which owns a majority interest in Teva Pharmaceuticals; and Newbridge, which recently concluded a multi-million dollar deal with the Israeli electronics giant, Tadiran. Israel's economic minister for North America, Giora Meyuhas, will also be making a presentation.

The conference begins with a trade show and cocktail reception at 5 p.m. on May 11. Information on sponsorship or exhibitor opportunites is available from Meir Klein at (416) 631-5739.

Phone Fury

ISRAEL — The monopoly over telecommunications in Israel, held by Bezeq, appears to be over and the company's workers are furious. They recently disrupted phone service to protest a new licence granted by the government, which opens Bezeq to competition in just about every field.

Customers will no longer be forced to buy their phones from Bezeq, nor will they be compelled to pay the company's monthly insurance fees for telephones. Long distance calling will become competitive as well.

The government is giving Bezeq until the end of next year to adjust to its new operating licence and won't take any action until May 20.

Bezeq has responded by appealing to Israel's Supreme Court.

Israel Develops a Fine China Relationship

ISRAEL — Israeli entrepreneurs are increasingly looking to the Far East for business and coming back with their hands full. Virtually every week Israel and China are announcing new joint ventures.

Israeli architect Beni Shadmi is building a $20 million, four-million-square-foot complex in Shenyang. It will house a shopping mall, a sports facility, a cultural centre and a three star hotel. Other proposals from Israeli firms for projects in the Shenyang region are on the way.

On the opposite side, a group of Chinese business people, in partnership with an Israeli consortium, is reportedly interested in building a Chinese folk-style village on the Dead Sea. It would be the world's first, with Chinese citizens living and working there.

An Israeli company, Mennen Medical, will be supplying 40 Chinese hospitals with equipment in a $5.5 million deal, and two Chinese scientists recently visited the Weizmann Institute for advanced solar technology advice.

New Country Research Service

ISRAEL — Israel is developing trade ties with different countries so quickly, the business world can't keep up with information about them. So Goldnet, an Israeli communications partnership, is offering customized reports for clients who need to know about business in any nation.

Goldnet can provide data on such subjects as business benefits and risks, opportunities and general economic conditions.

Some of the countries researched by Goldnet do not have diplomatic relations with Israel.

Anticipate asthma attacks

Israeli device permits diagnosis by telephone for asthma sufferers.

TEL AVIV — A new device developed in Israel enables asthma sufferers to anticipate an acute attack by regularly monitoring their breathing over the telephone.

The patient need only breathe into a specially designed tube once a day as prescribed. The tube is connected to a telephone, which automatically dials through to a hospital computer that analyzes the health of the asthma sufferer.

"If the computer reading determines that the patient's health shows cause for concern," explains Dr. Marcel Topilsky of the Department of Internal Medicine at Ichilov Hospital in Tel Aviv, who helped develop the device, "then the asthma sufferer can be immediately summoned to the medical centre or warned to rest."

Known as the P-100, the innovative instrument was developed by Shahal Medical Services and the Israeli electronics conglomerate Tadiran, in collaboration with an American partner, Servable Technology Inc., of Washington, D.C.

Tips From Pros

TORONTO — While changing laws and regulations are addressing some corporate accountability issues, companies shouldn't forget the need to make further improvements in how they communicate with their stakeholders, says Ernst & Young in its annual report on financial reporting issues.

"Corporate governance responsibilities are not static," says Robert Lord, vice-chair of the firm. "They evolve over time in response to shareholder demands. We are in an age where information and communication are highly prized possessions. And a company that can improve its communication with its stakeholders — lenders, investors, suppliers, customers and employees — will enhance important relationships, prevent costly misunderstandings and encourage responsible corporate conduct.

The report maintains that structural change may be needed but that it is also crucial for all participants in the process to be completely knowledgeable as to their specific responsibilities. "Each of the key players — management, boards of directors, independent auditors and, in some cases, regulators — needs to understand their responsibilities within the overall framework of corporate governments and each needs to communicate its requirements and findings openly with other participants," says the report.

Financial reporting is only one aspect of corporate governance. But the external auditor and, in some cases, the regulator, has a key role to play by communicating appropriate information to boards and their audit committees on a timely basis, says Lord. "Everyone is affected by weak corporate governance — shareholders, board directors and auditors — we all can benefit from a stronger infrastructure, a clearer definition of expectations and better communication."

Ernst & Young has been active in helping clients understand and react to corporate governance issues. A client bulletin on executive compensation disclosure requirements in Ontario was released recently to note changes which affect members of the board's compensation committee.

The firm also produces a booklet, Anticipating Subjects of Interest to Shareholders. It was prepared to help boards of directors prepare for annual meetings by anticipating shareholder queries. Some sample questions include:

- Has the company developed a succession plan for key management positions, including the CEO?
- Does the company's code of conduct to guide officers and employees also cover outside directors? How is compliance monitored?
- Do all directors review and personally sign the Annual Information Form? Do all directors review the proxy statement?
- Why aren't more women and minorities on the Board or in top-level management positions?

Full accountability, up to boards of directors and through boards to stakeholders and regulars, is essential for all organizations, says Lord. "It's hard to foresee everything that might happen in the future but what is crystal clear is that there will be further changes in response to rising stakeholder expectations."

The report also mentions that NAFTA negotiations are prompting a joint study by the three national accounting institutes to analyze accounting and reporting standards. The aim is to achieve greater comparability in financial reporting as cross-border activity increases.

Unprecedented economic boom before proposed peace process

By SIMON GRIVER
Special to The CJN

ISRAEL — Even before the peace process began, the Israeli economy enjoyed a period of sustained growth. Now there are predictions of an unprecedented boom with the new climate of peace boosting trade and tourism, and providing an atmosphere of confidence for foreign investment in Israel.

Bank of Israel governor Dr. Yaakov Frankel stresses that the Israeli economy performed impressively before the peace agreement. "Massive immigration has fueled growth," he explains, "and boosted the economic recovery that was begun in the mid-1980s." Indeed, since the beginning of 1990, Israel's population has grown by more than 10 per cent; many of the newcomers are academics and professionals from the former Soviet Union.

Israel recorded more than 6 per cent growth in its Gross Domestic Product (GDP) and several per cent per capita increase in income over each of the past two years. Almost all the economic indicators have been impressive for 1992 and 1993. In 1992, inflation dipped below 10 per cent to 9.4 per cent for the first time in many years. Inflation climbed again to 11.2 per cent in 1993 due to the steep rise in property prices, which soared by 24 per cent over the last year. Excluding property, inflation was only 7.4 per cent.

Israel's currency, the shekel, has remained stable over the past few years even though it was a turbulent period for exchange rates, especially in Western Europe. In part, this was thanks to an impressive array of fiscal innovations implemented by the Bank of Israel. For example, the shekel is linked to a basket of the world's major currencies that reflects the composition of Israel's principal trading partners.

Exports rose by 10 per cent during 1992 to nearly $13 billion, and by a further 13 per cent in 1993 to more than $14 billion. Imports also grew over this period with the balance of trade deficit (goods) remaining steady at $5 billion. Israel's foreign debt fell by $1.1 billion to $23.4 billion.

Lucrative

Part of Israel's balance of trade shortfall was covered in 1993 by a record year for tourism in which 1.97 million visitors spent more than $2 billion. The forecast is that this record will be broken again in 1994 with nearly 2.5 million tourists expected, as the peace process is certain to encourage increased tourism to the region.

The Tel Aviv Stock Exchange began 1993 with significant falls as investors sold shares and took profits. But the market surged ahead again with the signing of the peace accord and by the end of the year, the average share had risen by more than 20 per cent.

According to Israel's Finance Minister Avraham Shochat, it is in attracting foreign investment that the peace dividend will prove its most lucrative benefit to the Israeli economy.

"If there is peace," insists Shochat, "then the economic potential is almost unlimited. There is a change in atmosphere in the region that is conductive to the business sector coming in and doing something."

Shochat observes that only a few of the world's major conglomerates have made significant investments in Israel. "The big foreign firms that have already come to Israel," he adds, "like Motorola and IBM, have told me they have made good profits and are going to bring in more money to invest."

Economists echo the politicians' sentiments. Professor Dan Galai of the Hebrew University's School of Business Administration also offers an upbeat assessment of Israel's economic future.

"With the peace process," he says, "it is possible the country will make it as an emerging market and attract institutional investors."

Israel is also confident it can attract significant Japanese investors. Japan, a natural partner for Israel's largely high-tech economy, along with countless countries and corporations worldwide, adhered to the Arab boycott because of its dependence on Arab oil.

All this investment will, it is hoped, reduce Israel's level of unemployment, which rose from 9 per cent in 1989 to 11 per cent in 1992, but dropped back to 10.6 per cent last year.

Israel is also hoping to attract some of the business for implementing the desperately-needed basic infrastructure for the areas that will be under Palestinian autonomy. At the same time, Israel is forging ahead with its own major infrastructure projects, which include a trans-Israel highway, a six-kilometre tunnel under Mount Carmel in Haifa, and a new airport terminal to double the capacity of Ben-Gurion International Airport.

By SYLVIA PAPERNICK

TORONTO — You won't find a microwave or a can opener in Alfie Torres' kitchen — they're not used.

As Torres, manager of Restaurant 212 explains, "we get what's freshest and only cook with the season." He adds that ingredients are not pre-prepared.

Restaurant 212, and its sister restaurant Bistro 990, specialize in market fresh cuisine that is elegantly prepared and presented.

Their menus reflect the current trends towards healthier eating with less fat and an increased interest in vegetarianism. Torres point out that Spring Valley water is used exclusively in their cooking.

The corporation behind these restaurants is Chrysalis Restaurant Enterprises Inc. Its roster includes such local establishments as Bemelmans, Edgewater, Maccheroni, Cafe Belair Rhodes and Toby's Good Eats.

When Restaurant 212 was established across the street from Roy Thompson Hall, it moved into a location formerly occupied by Telfer's Restaurant. With other upscale restaurants like Fenton's and Three Small Rooms gone from the Toronto scene, there was a need for such a dining establishment. The challenge for Restaurant 212 was to keep some of Telfer's customers coming back and win new clients with an injected '90s attitude which reflected healthy, enjoyable eating. They seem to have succeeded.

The restaurant, housed in a historical building, offers patrons elegant dining served in an art deco setting. The look is completed by classic palladium windows, brass chandeliers and six metre high ceilings. Dinner and dancing are provided on weekends with live entertainment.

The more intimate Bistro 990 is situated on Bay Street just north of Wellesley. It opened five years ago in anticipation of the opera house than slated to open across the street. The opera house never opened but Bistro 990 has remained and flourished ever since.

It has carved out a niche for itself as "the place to see and be seen."

Celebrity watchers might catch a glimpse of any number of actors, authors or athletes there. Diners include Margaret Atwood, Robert De Niro, Joan Collins, Gordon Thompson, Pierre Trudeau and Robert Fulford. Bistro 990 often pops up in local society columns and was mentioned in a Philadelphia paper's sport section last fall in a story about the Toronto Blue Jays. It has beome the unofficial headquarters of The Festival of Festivals and has even been used as a backdrop for films.

Alfred Caron, general manager of Bistro 990, explains that the cocooning trend of the late '80s is ending. He feels that people now have the attitude that "as Canadians, we're taxed and that's the way of life, so let's spend it. I see people spending more money now than they used to."

His sales are proof of this as they had increased 20 per cent at the end of 1993.

"I believe that we're going back to basics. We see it in New York. People want to eat fresh — home cooking is big."

I know that your are out there. And I wonder about you. What's taking so long? When will I finally see you smile, and hear you laugh? I have risked so much in hope of finding you. I thought that we had met before. The feeling was very strong. And often it lasted quite a while. But it wasn't you. Were you watching and waiting? I'm ready now. I've done my time and so have you. Let's start.
I'm male, 47, divorced, no kids. But I really want some of my own.
Only letter with photo will be considered. Photo returned upon request.Box 6200 CJN

Jewish film festival set for Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A Winnipeg businesswoman has decided to organize a Jewish film festival in this city after hearing her partner's mother describe how she survived the Holocaust.

Over the Christmas holidays, Lorrie Warwick and her partner, Dr. Edward Baral, were vacationing in Hawaii with his mother and stepfather, Helena Baral Penner and Martin Penner of Melbourne, Australia. They were talking about Schindler's List and Martin Penner mentioned that he and other members of his family were among the Jews that Schindler had saved. Baral Penner's story of survival was equally dramatic.

Baral Penner and her first husband were both physicians in Poland before the war. They managed to escape from a concentration camp and were in hiding for almost two years. A couple of weeks before the war ended, he took a chance and went out of hiding to get supplies. He was recognized by a former patient, betrayed to the Nazis and murdered. Edward Baral was born a month later.

Following the war, Baral Penner and her young son spent some time in refugee camps and then returned to Poland where she pursued further medical studies.

Thirty years later, she married long-time friend Penner and they settled in Melbourne where he was living.

(Edward Baral also went into medicine in Poland but went to Sweden in 1968 after the anti-Semitic agitation in Poland in 1967 and 68. He earned his degree in Sweden and came to Winnipeg eight years ago.)

"I decided I wanted to do something to recognize Ed's mother and her experiences," says Warwick. "Schindler's List seemed to set the stage for dealing with the Holocaust in the mainstream. We decided to create a charitable foundation in Helena's name. The film festival is our first event."

Warwick says she received a lot of help from the Toronto Jewish Film Festival's Debra Plotkin and Helen Zuckerman in putting together the selection of films — which deal with a full range of Jewish history and culture — and in bringing to Winnipeg some of the producers, directors and actors associated with the films and some of the people profiled in them.

Among those who have confirmed they are coming is Allan Starski, the Academy Award winning art director for Schindler's List, whom Baral recognized as an old childhood friend from Poland.

The Helena Baral Penner Foundation, she says, will be undertaking other cultural and charitable functions as well. Proceeds from this festival are being donated to the YMHA Jewish Community Centre and Citizens Against Impaired Driving.

Legal service set

TORONTO — Non-profit social service agencies and charities will receive much-needed free legal services and advice from the new Volunteer Lawyers Service.

The Canadian Bar Association — Ontario (CBAO), United Way of Greater Toronto, Volunteer Centre of Metropolitan Toronto (a United Way member agency) and Law Society of Upper Canada have joined forces to help eligible Metro charities. This marks the first time that law professionals have collectively organized with a non-profit organization to provide legal assistance.

Groups requiring assistance will apply to United Way or the Volunteer Centre, which will assess the applications on the basis of specific criteria. The groups do not need to be members of United Way. Successful applicants will be referred to CBAO for identification of an appropriate lawyer. Eligible agencies and organizations will be able to draw on a roster of lawyers for free assistance with their legal problems including leasing, incorporation, charitable status and employment matters.
